I raised that point with a Ghanaian MP whom I happened to meet and he said, "Oh yes, that is very true. In fact, I came home one day to find a constituent who had left a dead body on my doorstep and who said, 'Unless you give me some money to bury that dead body, I'm going to leave it on your doorstep.'" Sure enough, that MP had to cough up. The prospect of having a dead body on one's doorstep would encourage anyone to provide the money. Expectations need to be managed, but I would not like this country to go down that route in terms of people's expectations of what we can deliver.

I was interested to see the seven participating countries in the shadowing scheme: Eritrea, Ethiopia, Kenya, Malawi, Tanzania, Uganda and Zambia. I shall return to Kenya's involvement shortly.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I am interested to hear the hon. Gentleman talk about the perceptions of Members of African Parliaments. They do things that we would not have to do. I learned that what sometimes appears to us as corruption is, for many Members of African Parliaments, being in a no-choice position. They are seen as a source of income in their communities, and they have far greater responsibilities for the support of families than we would ever have simply because there is no welfare, pension or care structure in place. Normally, a Member of an African Parliament is considered the person of last resort.

Tom Brake: I agree entirely with the hon. Lady. It is interesting that the work shadowing focused on improving the representation of women in Parliament, which I support. Unfortunately, the UK does worse in terms of representation—I must admit that my party does not help in this respect—than three of the countries that have signed up to millennium development goals, which require the countries concerned to improve their representation. We have something to respond to here as well.

Malawi was my patch. Would the hon. Gentleman be interested in my main thought in following the work, which was that governance was the issue? Governance is so often mentioned as a key priority. Bringing women into public life not only in Parliament, but across the level is an aspect of governance and something on which the British Council has worked creatively in Malawi by bringing civil society, local people and Members of Parliament together to understand how, by working together, they could contribute to governance and a different, more democratic way of going about things.

Tom Brake: Again, I agree entirely. The involvement of women is clearly not only about representation at parliamentary level, but about involvement with non-governmental organisations, civil society and so on.

I am interested in the British Council's pan-African projects, and I support their aims. An organization that can act as an advocate on Britain's behalf is important. It has become harder for the UK to put across its point of view, because of what has happened in Iraq. The British Council should be able to respond to that challenge. The perception of the UK has changed; that is certainly the impression that I get from my contacts.

As to the leadership proposal, I should be interested to know how the 1,500 potential leaders will be identified and how they will be prevented from deriving personal benefit from taking part in the scheme, as set out in the documentation. To what extent can the British Council or others involved in the initiative ensure that, for instance, certain disadvantaged sectors of society, such as people who might be excluded on a caste basis, will be represented in the group of potential leaders?

I know that the hon. Gentleman wants a reasonable time in which to conclude the debate. I hope, however, that he will be able to set out the relationship between the British Council and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, particularly in relation to Kenya's involvement in the work shadowing. I understand also that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, with the global opportunities fund and a programme called "Engaging with the Islamic world" is also active in Kenya. I wonder how those two things interact, particularly as one of the main outcomes there is also expected to be an increase in the representation of women.

There are certain institutions, such as Radio 4 and the BBC World Service, that we are all very proud of. I think that the British Council falls into that category, and I am very supportive of its work.

3.22 pm

Mr. Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) on securing this important debate following her interesting visit to Zambia with the British Council's women in politics and leadership project. The British Council is at the forefront of furthering cultural relations between Britain and the rest of the world, and the Conservative party is extremely supportive of its work. However, I am a little disappointed that the Foreign Office does not share our enthusiasm for the British Council—it has been unable to send at least one of its six Ministers. I mean no disrespect to the hon. Gentleman who will reply on behalf of the Government today, who I know will do so extremely ably and articulately.

The British Council's main raison d'être is to gain recognition abroad for the UK's values, ideas and achievements, and to build lasting, mutually beneficial relationships between the United Kingdom and other countries. It is of key importance to British foreign policy. Specifically, the British Council's role in Africa is vital. I want to record our thanks to all of those who work for the British Council in Africa, who are doing excellent work.

We all know that Africa poses great challenges. It is the only continent that has regressed economically in the past 20 years. It is also a continent of vast wealth and opportunity. Because of its reputation of trust and integrity and the long-term programmes of assistance, the British Council is in an unparalleled position to help Africans to meet the challenges that they face.

Historically, one of the greatest problems with African Governments has been the lack of democratic accountability, and the lack of institutions to facilitate a pluralistic civil society. Sadly, that has led to chronic political instability in many African countries. Corrupt and inept leadership, combined with a history of human rights abuses, inter-ethnic rivalries and, more recently and very sadly, the explosion of HIV/AIDS, have left many parts of Africa lagging behind the rest of the world in building markets, trading and improving the macro and microeconomic well-being of its citizens. That can be seen in comparison to extraordinary economic growth in China and India, which is lifting millions of people out of poverty.

Sadly, Africa has generally stagnated. I shall give one example to illustrate that. Forty years ago, Nigeria was much wealthier than South Korea, with approximately the same population. Whereas Nigeria's oil wealth was squandered, South Korea invested in educating people and targeted key export industries in the west. It is now a leading export nation and has a per capita income 20 times higher than Nigeria. While both countries have found it difficult to make the transition to full democracy, South Korea did not suffer from the same corrupt military leadership, and lessons must be learned from that.

I shall not give a detailed analysis of the multi-faceted problems that exist across Africa, but the problems can be summarised into three key areas: the lack of political stability in Africa and subsequent conflicts; the poor education of citizens; and the lack of sustainable development. The British Council's work in facilitating democratic governance, fostering development and providing education addresses those areas. It is an excellent programme working in partnership with the African-led New Partnership for Africa's Development. I agree with the hon. Member for Crosby wholeheartedly that we should be listening and not lecturing, and the British Council scheme is a starting point for that. NEPAD also shows the real desire of Africans to work with other formal and voluntary international bodies and NGOs to move forward.

The British Council's work, together with its invaluable partnerships with the Commonwealth, the World Bank and countless other bodies, means that it is uniquely placed to build support for the reform needed to ensure that African countries and Governments become more accountable to their public. Without a strong and vibrant civil society, it is exceptionally difficult to hold a Government to account and to ensure that they act in the public interest rather than in the interests of the ruling ethnicity, clique or family. In contrast, a robust civil society can deliver honest and effective rule, which all African people deserve.

The British Council works on that directly and must be supported in its challenge. For example, it set up the leadership programme that we heard about earlier—the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) made some good points that I hope that the Minister's stand-in will answer in his summing-up. The council has given civil society leaders in Africa the chance to learn from accumulated experience in the UK, where civil society has grown over the centuries. It has also been instrumental in transferring working knowledge to African parliamentarians through the programmes that we heard about earlier.

That excellent initiative was supported by the Conservative party, particularly by my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan). She took part in the programme and hosted a female Kenyan Member of Parliament who visited the UK. The differences between female British and female African MPs were highlighted by the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock). Interestingly enough, however, my hon. Friend found that there were similarities between the problems facing female MPs: how to reach out to the electorate; how to balance family life with a demanding political career; and, slightly worryingly, how to deal with male colleagues.

The council has played a vital role in international development for 40 years and is currently working in 50 developing countries. We are pleased that this programme is part of a wider strategy to promote democratic government, education and trade. Sustainable development must ultimately be based on free market principles to ensure that the benefits of economic activity accrue to those who invest their time in enterprise and work, not to those who happen to be in power. People must have secure property rights but, without sustainable economic development, Africa's future will remain bleak. Countries should follow Botswana's example and attract foreign investment to grow their economies and to generate revenues to expand public services, as was rightly alluded to by the hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt).

I agree with the British Council that business will invest only if there is a viable operating environment and the skills in the local market to operate those businesses. Paramount among those skills are communications skills. The teaching of English is key. English is now the language of international commerce and business, and the council is a world leader in teaching English. Excellent English not only helps Africans to communicate with foreign businesses but enables them to join the international community of fellow English speakers and to benefit from courses and degrees taught in English. I understand that last year the British Council delivered more than 1 million hours of teaching, and set and marked 1.15 million UK exams. We should all applaud that extraordinary achievement. The council has reached more than 10 million people through teaching centres, libraries and information services, to which other hon. Members have referred.

Before I finish, I shall ask a few specific questions that I would like the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Murphy), who will speak on behalf of the Government, to address, if he can, this afternoon. First, what assessment has been made of the value for money that the Government receive for the £180 million grant in aid that the Foreign Office gives the British Council? How are the outputs measured? That point was raised by the council in the evidence that it gave to the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs in detailing its "Strategy 2010: Our Vision for the Future".

Secondly, the council has expressed serious concerns that grant in aid of £204 million for 2007–08 may have an adverse impact on its good work in Africa and throughout the world. What assurances can the Government provide that there will be no diminution in the service provided by the council?

Thirdly, the council operates out of 280 premises in 110 countries. The 2004 spending review stated that efficiency savings would be realised by > "reductions in the size of their overseas estates".

I hope that we shall receive an assurance that such reductions will not lead to the sort of shambolic sell-off of good-quality property that the Foreign Office has instigated across the world and particularly in New York.

[Mr. Mark Simmonds]

The fourth point was alluded to by the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Valerie Davey). What links does the British Council have with the further education sector in this country, and what are the Government doing to facilitate vocational learning and training throughout Africa? I am referring to Africans being educated in the UK and in their respective African countries.

Finally, is it right that the British Council operates in Zimbabwe, given the terrible abuses of both white and black people that are going on there? Do we not need to consider very carefully whether that sends the wrong signals to the currently appalling Mugabe regime?

In conclusion, the British Council is a unique institution because of its experience, reach, professionalism and integrity, but above all because it is practical.

3.32 pm

Mr. Jim Murphy (Eastwood) (Lab): I am delighted to have the opportunity to respond to the debate. First, I apologise on behalf of the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), who cannot be here today. It is fairly reasonable and understandable to offer hon. Members such an apology in this discussion of the British Council's work in Africa, because he is in Africa—in Kenya. I am delivering this response as the Foreign and Commonwealth Office Whip. I am sure that my hon. Friend will respond to any questions that I cannot answer in the short time available.

As I said, I am pleased to have the opportunity to respond to the debate. It is not a regular occurrence for a Whip to be heard on any issue, but if there is one important issue that we should be heard on, it is the work of the British Council, its support of the Government's work in Africa and the Government's work to support the Commission for Africa. We are providing whatever moral and political support we can to NEPAD to help African leaders who are looking for African solutions to problems that are, unfortunately, far too common in Africa.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) not only on securing the debate but on its fortuitous timing, which she mentioned. She spoke with her usual passion and knowledge. Her anecdote about the BBC reminded me of the time when I travelled to the Negev desert with Bedouin tribesmen and we had—I am sure that they are not listening, so I can say this—a cup of what was possibly the worst coffee that I have ever tasted. I also received what was possibly the best hospitality that I have ever received, listening to the BBC World Service in the Negev desert.

My hon. Friend paid great compliments to the British Council on its work in Africa. I am pleased that she did so because she was correct. Not only is the British Council doing excellent work on that continent, but the British Government, as she said, have prioritised the issue of Africa for our presidency of both the G8 and the EU. The Government believe it to be crucial that the British Council fits within that work and that we work in a complementary manner to deliver the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's priorities, but that the British Council should have a degree of operational independence—something that is acknowledged to be essential throughout Parliament and across the parties.

We also had the good fortune to hear from my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt), who is chairman of the all-party group on the British Council. He was to correct to identify the power of technology, which the British Council has identified as a key part of its 2005 strategy. He is probably the only hon. Member who has visited more countries in Africa than the Minister with responsibility for Africa; in that respect he is ahead of anyone else in Parliament.

We also heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Valerie Davey) about her work in the women in politics programme in Tanzania, her teacher training in Kutoke and her experience of having met a former pupil. On arriving in Parliament, I had a similar experience with my right hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), when I reminded him that he was my teacher in secondary school in Glasgow. He is still with us in the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West will be aware that Tanzania is the greatest recipient of UK development assistance in Africa, and she also raised a number of other points that I will be happy to discuss with her. I am delighted that we also heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock) about her work in the women in politics programme in Zambia.

We have spoken about the fascinating and important work that the British Council carries out in educating populations and individuals around the world, but it is clear from listening to hon. Members' impassioned speeches that it is also informing politicians and parliamentarians in this country in a way that perhaps was not initially envisaged. It is not only informing but influencing political values and philosophy on the Labour Benches, as well as on other Benches.

Hon. Members highlighted the issue of water, either for building bricks or for water-treatment plants. It is interesting to note that, on average, African women and girls spend three hours every day fetching and carrying water. That prevents a number of young girls from going to school, which is an additional problem.

3.37 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

4.1 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Murphy: I was about to compliment my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Helen Jackson) on her speech, but she has not yet returned to the Chamber.

A number of questions were asked about Zambia and the heavily indebted poor countries—HIPC conditions, and about achieving the completion point in HIPC. It is expected that Zambia will reach completion in early 2005. That will reduce the debt by two thirds, from $4 billion to $1.5 billion. Although that still leaves a large debt, it is a remarkable reduction.

The hon. Members for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) and for Boston and Skegness (Mr. Simmonds) asked a number of questions. I shall answer as many as time allows. They asked about fluctuation contracts, which are primarily a matter for the British Council; such contracts operate independently of Government, and there is no reason for increasing grant aid to cover them. In respect of the 1,500 scholarships, people from 19 countries will be selected in conjunction with their African partners to ensure a proper profile mix of age, gender and region.

I was asked about Kenya and about the Islamic world. We operate with the advice, support and expertise of the British Council to engage with the Islamic world programmes. We work with a joint public policy board in Kenya, and we try to co-operate with and complement the work of the British Council there.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness was right to say that the British Council still operates in Zimbabwe. I do not suggest that he advocates that it should not do so, but for the purposes of consistency I should say that the British Council operated in South Africa during the horrible apartheid regime. The then Conservative Government supported the continuation of that work and the council's engagement with civil and civic society. The British Council was not contaminated with the ethos or the policies of the South African Government, and nor is it contaminated now by those of Zimbabwe.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is a great tribute to the British Council that it should stay in countries with such huge problems, as many NGOs simply pull out? The indigenous populations feel abandoned. Is it not an exceptionally good thing that the British Council should stay in such countries?

Mr. Murphy: Absolutely. I pay tribute to the many thousands of staff throughout the world who work for the British Council; some of them have been mentioned, but time does not allow us to hear of the work of them all. The courage of the British Council staff who carry out such work in Zimbabwe should be put on record.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness asked about value for money. A Foreign Office questionnaire is sent to all FCO posts asking about the British Council's contribution to the FCO's objectives. I am delighted to say that about 90 per cent. of the responses compliment the British Council on its work and believe that it offers excellent value for money.

I am pleased to join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to the work of the British Council. It works with us in partnership to deliver a strong, democratic and prosperous Africa. We still have much to achieve in that respect, as we have heard eloquently pointed out today. The council recently launched its forward-looking "Strategy 2010", which strives to reflect the UK's international priorities. We welcome the "Strategy 2010" programme. It will make the council more flexible and efficient and equip it to respond quickly to changing public diplomacy needs. A key feature of the restructuring is the development of regional groups, as successfully piloted in the southern Africa region.

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the British Council face similar issues with regard to security. Both were pleased that the requests for a full bid of £4 million and a further £6 million as part of the 2004 spending review were granted so that improvements could be undertaken to ensure heightened security.

There is not ample opportunity in this vote-interrupted debate to pay accurate or appropriate tribute to the work of the British Council. That lack of opportunity is also due to the number of hon. Members who chose to attend the debate and to pay their own tributes to its work. However, on behalf of the UK Government and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, I would like to put on record our thanks to the leadership of the British Council and our praise for the staff members who operate in countries throughout the world, particularly in Africa. They rightly raise the profile of the United Kingdom and challenge some of the perceptions about it, but more importantly, they provide skills, information, training and personal and character development for many individuals throughout the world. We have heard examples of that related to Africa.

In a time of heightened cynicism about politics and politicians, anyone listening to the passion with which hon. Members spoke today would know that politics can be a force for good. The British Council plays an important part in informing politicians to argue for change, as has happened today, and its work is a crucial part of the priorities of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. I thank the leadership and the staff for the sterling work that they do on our behalf.

Disability Living Allowance

4.7 pm

Mr. Martin Caton (Gower) (Lab): I know that my hon. Friend the Minister is aware of the "Mobilise" campaign being run by Help the Aged and a coalition of more than 20 organisations that work in the fields of disability and ageing. The central objective of that campaign, which already has the support of 230 Members of the House, is to remove the upper age limit of 65 for claiming disability living allowance. At present, if someone becomes disabled after that age, they cannot get DLA. They can claim attendance allowance, but that benefit is much more limited. Attendance allowance has no mobility component, so there is no financial help with mobility costs, no access to the Motability scheme, no access to the specialised vehicle fund and no exemption from vehicle excise duty.

I support the "Mobilise" campaign. I believe that the current rules discriminate against older people who become disabled after 65. The rules stand in the way of that group of people living as independent, healthy and active lives as they otherwise might. In the name of justice and equality, I hope that the Government will look again at the upper age limit for that benefit.

This afternoon, however, I want to focus on the other end of the spectrum—the lower age limit for eligibility for the mobility component of DLA, as it affects some severely disabled young children. Before I do so, however, I want to pay tribute to what the Government have already done to help disabled people to live fuller lives. For children, that includes things such as the increases in the disabled child premium, the introduction of the disabled income guarantee, and the disabled and enhanced disabled child element in the child tax credit. In April 2001, the Government also reduced the age of eligibility for the mobility component of the DLA from five years to three years. That decision—taken on medical grounds—was very welcome.

Today, I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to go that bit further for some children under the age of three. To make my case, I want to tell her about the experience of a family in my constituency, Mr. and Mrs. Owen—Andrew and Alison—and their daughter, Seren. Seren was born on 14 April 2002 by caesarean section in Singleton hospital, Swansea. She was in a very poor way, and Alison and Andrew were warned after 18 hours that she was likely to die. The only treatment that could save her was at Glenfield hospital in Leicester.

A Sea King helicopter was sent to Leicester for necessary equipment and a nurse, and then to Swansea for Seren. They were told that they should name the child, in case she did not survive. As it was night when she was picked up and taken up into the sky, they called her Seren, which means star in the Welsh language. Seren was and is a fighter, and she lived, and returned to Swansea. When she was 12 days old, her parents were told that she had cerebral palsy. In fact, she has quadriplegic cerebral palsy with hypertonia in all four limbs and hypotonia in her torso. She has cerebral visual impairment and some sensory hearing impairment.

Although in her short life so far Seren has received a lot of medical attention and hospital treatment, the good news is that comparatively recent developments in equipment for children with her sort of condition can mean that operations and other intrusive treatments that would otherwise have been necessary as she grew up can be avoided. Her parents, like all parents, want to give her the best, highest quality of life possible. They have got hold of a range of positioning and seating equipment designed to aid postural management. I have visited the Owen family in their home; I have seen that equipment and lifted, or tried to lift, some of it. It is extremely bulky and some is very heavy.

I want to go through what the Owens need to take with them when they take Seren out for the day, or part of the day, and what they need if they want to take her away for a longer period of time—to visit her grandparents or go on holiday. For a day out in Andrew's Golf car, the first essential is the specialist car seat, which gives total posture support and keeps Seren's spine straight, hopefully helping to remove the need for operations to correct curvature at a later stage. It is extremely heavy; in the family, only Andrew can lift it, and even then it is not good for his health. Living and working arrangements mean that it has to be transferred between vehicles at times.

They also need Seren's special wheelchair for when the family reach their destination. It has been issued by the artificial limb and appliance centre at Rookwood and involves a CAPS II seating system that fits within a Blade Plus wheelchair. That is what they call an aggressive form of seating and support and, as with the car seat, gives the postural management that she needs. It is a solid piece of equipment, which does not fold down like a normal pushchair or even some wheelchairs. In the Golf, it completely fills the boot.

Add the tubes and feeding sets that Seren needs, as well as the normal baby stuff for a child of her age, and there is only room for mum, dad and Seren. If any members of the extended family, especially grandparents, want to accompany them, a second car has to be taken. I cannot help wondering what happens in a family with other, older children and a severely disabled child of less than three years. Are they denied the opportunity of going out as a family at all?

Apart from Alison and Andrew's determination that they should go out as a family and do the things that we all do as families, Seren needs to be transported to different places for her development: for physiotherapy and hydrotherapy, the NCH stepping stones project, occupational therapy, speech therapy and work with her vision impairment teacher.

What happens if Alison and Andrew want to take Seren somewhere and stay overnight, or over several nights? What is needed then? They need all the things that I have mentioned for a day trip, of course, as well as Seren's Jenx standing frame. She needs that because, as she cannot walk or stand, the ball and socket joint in her hips will not develop normally. The standing frame helps compensate for that, again hopefully reducing the likelihood of the need for later, restorative surgery or other treatment. She will also need her R82 Panda hi/lo chair, which is her feeding and social interaction chair. It is a sort of waistcoat design that provides total support of the torso but frees the arms to reduce tension. That piece of equipment, on its own, also completely fills the boot of the Golf.

Seren cannot yet take all her food by mouth. She receives food overnight through a pump feeding system that involves a stand and pump. That needs to be taken, as do the foods and medicines that she requires. On a longer stay away, Alison and Andrew would want to take the special toys that Seren has, which are designed to aid the development of children with severe learning difficulties. They would like to be able to take Seren's other, more comfortable tumble-form chair, which is made with foam sponge and in which she can spend up to half an hour without harm being done. They would want her "Wedge and Drema" sleep system that keeps her legs separated when she is sleeping, which is also important for her future development.

It is impossible for the Owen family to travel in one car on a visit overnight or longer, at least without leaving beneficial pieces of equipment behind. Fortunately, Alison manages to run another small car, so although they cannot travel as a family, they have the means to get themselves and all of Seren's stuff from A to B. How do families manage when they do not have access to a second vehicle? I suspect that some are largely trapped in their homes.

To add to the difficulties for Seren's family, she has just had Botox injections to loosen her hips. She is supposed to spend parts of her day in a plaster cast—her present cast is removable—but she is due for another series of jabs, after which she will be fitted with a full plaster cast that will not be taken off for some time. Transporting her in a normal family car will again be made more difficult.

The Owens' dream, which they cannot get near to affording, is for a specially adapted, large people-mover vehicle, with any lip on the boot removed, a ramp or lift on the back so that Seren could be wheeled straight in, and room for the other equipment. If the mobility component of DLA, and therefore access to a Motability deal, were available to under-threes such as Seren, the Owen family could have had that since they had first needed it. Through a combination of determination, superb logistical planning and buckets full of love, Alison and Andrew have made sure that Seren has had everything that they could provide that could help her, including getting her out and about.

As Seren will be three next April, the Owens realise that if even if the Government agreed to consider changing the rules now, they would be unlikely to benefit. However, they asked me to raise the issue in the hope that other families can benefit from the help that they did not receive in the first three years of Seren's life.

I first met Seren and her mum towards the end of last year. I visited them during a street surgery that I had organised in their village and neighbouring areas. At that time, they were also being denied a blue badge by the local authority. We managed to get that sorted out, and I wrote to the Minister on the issue that I am raising now—the lower age limit for mobility. In honesty, though, I did not fully understand the extent of the problem, and consequently I did not make anything like as full a case as I should. I concentrated just on the wheelchair and posture-protecting seating issue, when I should also have brought attention to the other items of necessary equipment that I have mentioned this afternoon.

In the responses I received from the Government, the point was made very clearly and logically that entitlement to the mobility component of DLA is based on an > "inability or virtual inability to perform the physical act of walking".

I appreciate that it follows that as children in their first years of life do not walk, or do not walk to get around independently, the benefit is not regarded as appropriate for them. Put simply, for most kids until they are three, they will mostly travel by pushchair. Most kids' pushchairs fold easily, and are light and compact. Most kids do not need standing frames, special chairs, feeding pumps and the other equipment that I have mentioned, when they travel. Seren and some other kids do.

I am not calling for the three-year limit to be completely removed. For many children who are disabled, a normal pushchair or even small wheelchair will be their main means of movement, and they will not require much more equipment than an able-bodied child in their first three years. What I want is the introduction of some flexibility, so that the category of child who needs specialist equipment to travel with them can benefit from the mobility component of DLA. We are talking not about huge numbers or amounts of money from the national Exchequer, but about the possibility of making a huge difference to the lives of families such as Seren's.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Maria Eagle): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Caton) on raising such a tremendously important issue. He rather modestly said that he did not make as full a case as he should have when he originally wrote to me. Whatever he feels about his original letter, he has certainly made a full and proper case today.

I start by saying how much we can all appreciate the difficulties that Seren and her family have faced as a result of her disabilities. This debate gives me an opportunity to explain the basis of entitlement to the mobility component of disability living allowance. I understand my hon. Friend's points, and I thank him for the balanced way in which he set out his case and explained his understanding of the Government's position on the benefit as a whole.

The DLA provides a contribution towards disability-related extra costs for people who are severely disabled early or relatively early in life. That is the raison d'être of the benefit, which focuses on severely disabled people because they have reduced opportunities to work, earn and save, as compared with people for whom the onset of disability comes later in life and, perhaps, with the increasing frailty of old age.

There is a care component and a mobility component to the DLA, as my hon. Friend explained. In broad terms, entitlement to the care component depends on the effect that physical and/or mental disability has on a person's need for personal care from someone else. Entitlement to the higher-rate mobility component depends on whether a person is so physically disabled that they are unable or virtually unable to walk. Entitlement to the lower-rate mobility component depends on whether a person needs supervision or guidance from someone else when walking out of doors on unfamiliar routes because of a physical and/or mental disability. Those are the entitlement conditions.

Entitlement is not, therefore, based on specific medical conditions or particular physical conditions. It is based on the effects that a disability has on the personal care needs of each individual who claims it and on their ability to walk. For the DLA care component in cases involving children younger than 16, the need for personal care must be substantially in excess of that normally required by a child of the same age. That is the law. We recognise that some very young disabled children need substantially more care than non-disabled children. That is why there is no age limit at all on entitlement to the care component. However, entitlement to the higher-rate mobility component depends primarily on whether a severely disabled person is unable to perform the physical act of walking.

Identifying the likelihood of walking difficulties arising at some point in the future is not enough for entitlement. Decision makers who make such decisions on behalf of the Secretary of State must consider the person's ability to walk out of doors at the time a claim is made. They cannot anticipate later problems, but must consider the entitlement conditions on the date that the claim is made. Decision makers must take account of the distance over which, speed at which and length of time or manner in which a physically disabled person can make progress on foot without severe discomfort. Although the vast majority of children will be able to walk by the age of three or even two and a half, many will be unable to walk significant distances until the age of four. I describe such matters not to sound callous, but simply to set out what the law says and to remind hon. Members that the law must be applied equally in every case.

In the instance that my hon. Friend raised, we can all see that Seren has had significant difficulties, and will continue to do so. Given that it is clear that she will not be able to walk when she turns three, it is perfectly understandable for my hon. Friend to ask whether it does not therefore also seem clear that she ought to have the help that the benefit is meant to convey as early as possible. We can all understand the logic of that argument.

We have, fairly recently, considered carefully at what age the mobility component of the DLA should become available. As a result of that, we extended the higher rate to severely disabled three and four-year olds who are virtually unable to walk, with effect from 9 April 2001. The decision to lower the age from five to three was based on the views of the Government's medical advisers that three years is the earliest age at which it could be reasonably established that inability or virtual inability to walk is the result of physical disability rather than late, normal development.

I do not say on the basis of that that Seren might have late, normal development—that is clearly not the case. However, we must of course have rules that apply across the board, fairly and sensibly. At any one time, the change—reducing the age at which the DLA higher-rate mobility component and mobility components in general become payable—helps around 7,000 families with three or four-year-olds who either cannot walk because of their severe disability or have very limited walking ability.

I understand the issues that the Owen family face. I appreciate that they have problems transporting both their daughter and the necessary but bulky equipment that my hon. Friend described, including the heavy wheelchair. I am pleased that Seren gets the higher-rate care component of the DLA, which provides much-needed help to the family. However, I am powerless to intervene in individual awards—I know that my hon. Friend realises that but I want to make it clear. Awards can be made only if the entitlement conditions are met. I have no scope to waive those conditions and allow extra statutory payments or discretionary payments, however difficult the case may be.

Nevertheless, we recognise that the costs associated with disabled children can put extra pressure on families with low incomes. That is why we have introduced measures to improve financial support for families with disabled children. For example, we increased the additional elements for disabled children in the income-related benefits and tax credits since April 2001 by £17.40 above the normal cost of living increases to the current rate of £42.49 a week. We introduced the disability income guarantee in April 2001, through the enhanced disability premium. Families with severely disabled children benefit from an extra £17.08 in addition to the disabled child element or premium for each disabled child in their child tax credit or income-related benefit assessment, so additional help is available.

There is also a range of measures to help the least well-off families with disabled children. For example, help is available from the national health service with fares to hospital, and from the local authority social services with transport. A fund called the family fund may offer an avenue of help for exceptional cases such as this one. It can help with transport costs and may be able to give a grant if a child needs help getting out and about but does not get the higher-rate mobility component of the DLA. It has no waiting list for assistance, but the normal time taken from the application for such a grant to payment being made is about three months. In cases of urgent need, it may be able to work more quickly—applications can be fast-tracked and processed quicker. It buys vehicles to transport young children, but decisions made about grants from the family fund are a matter for that organisation, and I cannot promise that an application would be successful.

My hon. Friend is aware, as we all are, that Seren will be eligible to claim the higher-rate mobility component from her third birthday on 14 April 2005. It is possible for her family to apply for that up to three months in advance of her birthday to try to ensure that the award and the additional help is available to the family as soon as possible. I do not make the decisions, but judging from what my hon. Friend has said, I would be surprised if Seren was not eligible.

The specialised vehicle fund, which Motability uses to provide adapted vehicles of the sort that my hon. Friend suggested was the Owen family's dream, does not have a waiting list for applications. I would have high hopes that if and when Seren receives her higher-rate mobility component award—I hope that the family will apply three months before her birthday—the additional help offered by that award, by Motability and by the specialised vehicle fund could be put in place as soon as possible.

I also note that my hon. Friend referred to the "Mobilise" campaign and early-day motion 953. I have noticed that a significant number of hon. Members have taken a similar view to that expressed by my hon. Friend and have signed the early-day motion on the subject of people aged over-65 being denied access to the mobility components of the DLA in addition to the care components that they can get by applying for attendance allowance. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) tabled that early-day motion on 31 March and I recognise the undoubted level of concern among hon. Members who have signed it.

The campaign was launched in April by Help the Aged with the support of a range of other charities and interested groups. Its aim was to extend the provisions that were introduced to help those severely disabled people who were disabled early in life and to extend the mobility components beyond age 65. The key message of the campaign is that the current benefit arrangements are unjust and that the upper limit of 65 for claiming disability living allowance is discriminatory.

While I recognise the genuine concerns expressed by hon. Members and supporters of the "Mobilise" campaign, I do not accept that interpretation of the provisions. It is normal and sensible for pensions and benefit schemes to contain different provisions for people at different stages of their lives. Child benefit is not paid to adults, and pensions are not paid to children. It is normal for social security schemes to contain age-related rules. Government resources are not infinite and it is essential for help to be focused where it is most needed and most effective, in ways that reflect varying priorities and circumstances.

For example, we provide child benefit only for people with children, working tax credit for people of working age and state pensions to those over state retirement age. In many cases, people disabled after age 65 will have had fulfilling lives in work, with opportunities to earn and save, unlike those who have been disabled early in life. The aim of the benefit is to give additional help to those experiencing the onset of disability at an early stage. They have less chance to work and save, although we are making some inroads into that situation. For that reason, once awarded, disability living allowance can continue to be paid after age 65 if the conditions of entitlement continue to be met.

We believe that we are right to focus the most help on those disabled earlier in life, for the reasons that I have set out. Therefore, we currently have no proposals to change the rules. Of course, I understand the concerns that hon. Members have expressed. The mobility component of the DLA is part of the extra assistance that we focus on disabled people of working age, who face significantly more difficulties than those who have worked all their lives and develop mobility problems after the age of 65.

The DLA age 65 rule, if I can call it that, gives effect to that policy. It was originally set out in the legislation that established the benefits, and the preceding White Paper, and it has been endorsed by successive Governments. The purpose behind the benefits has not changed and the rules in respect of age have not changed. Nor, I am afraid to say to my hon. Friend, who raised the issue at the beginning of his speech, has the policy of the Government changed. I hope that, for the reasons I have outlined, my hon. Friend will understand the policy issue, even if he does not agree with it, and that the Owen family will apply as soon as possible—three months in advance of Seren's birthday—for the higher mobility component of the DLA. I am sure that they will do so, given the well-documented organisation that they are clearly capable of. I am assured that the specialised vehicle fund can be called into play very quickly thereafter. We all hope that Seren and her family will then have available a vehicle that will make their lives easier.

Voluntary-aided Schools (North-West)

4.33 pm

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): I would like to place on record my gratitude to my hon. Friend the Minister for the funding that has been made available to Knowsley council through the building schools for the future programme. I know that he is interested and involved in that work, together with the local education authority. It is very exciting and will lead to a major improvement in our secondary schools.

I would also say, in opening, that I am going to raise an issue that is of concern in one particular school in the Sefton part of my constituency. In doing so, I am not criticising the Government's policy towards voluntary aided schools. They, in common with all other schools, are receiving increased funding. Both the Roman Catholic archdiocese and the Church of England diocese are very grateful for that funding, as are all the governors, head teachers and parents of all those schools, who recognise that significant improvements have been made.

I first came against this problem in May this year when there was a fire in the school kitchens at the Holy Family school in my constituency. I should say a few introductory words about the school, with which my hon. Friend the Member for Bootle (Mr. Benton) will concur. The school is excellent, despite the fact that the buildings in which the school operates leave much to be desired, and despite other difficulties that the school has had to overcome. My hon. Friend the Minister will no doubt be aware of the results that it achieves in public examinations, which are very good, but he might not be aware of the fact that the Prime Minister's wife visited the school a year or two ago and opened its sixth form centre, which is an excellent addition for which the Department for Education and Skills provided a major part of the funding. It has not all been doom and gloom, but much of the school is in a pretty bad condition.

After the fire this May, the governors, the local education authority and the Department set off on an odyssey to resolve the problem. The situation was resolved very recently, for which I am grateful. It means that although the kitchens and dining area are being rebuilt, the replacement of three temporary classrooms, which I visited recently and which, frankly, are awful, will be put off until the next financial year.

I say that the problem has been resolved, and all the ducks now seem to be lined up for the funding, but the chairman of the school's board of governors asked me to seek the Minister's assurance today that he is confident that not only will the school kitchens and dining area be rebuilt, but that the three temporary classrooms will be replaced with new buildings in the next financial year. As I said, I visited the buildings recently and found them to be generally appalling. Children are being taught very well, but in very shabby circumstances. The rooms are difficult to heat and are too hot when it is hot and too cold when is cold. The storage facilities are also inadequate. It really is high time that they were replaced.

The situation at Holy Family school led me to the general issue of how funding works for voluntarily aided schools. I am indebted to both the Catholic archdiocese and the Church of England diocese for the briefing that they gave me, but I in no way hold them responsible for any of my errors in relating the issues to the Chamber.

As my hon. Friend the Minister will know, the buildings in the voluntarily aided sector usually belong to the Church, and the governing body is required to contribute 10 per cent. towards capital building work costs. The remaining 90 per cent. is provided by the DFES. This raises a couple of issues, which I want to highlight. First, because of this arrangement, the governing bodies of Church schools, in agreement with the DFES, insure their property for only 10 per cent. of any damaged building that might need to be reinstated. The custom and practice at the DFES was that 90 per cent. of that funding came from what is known as emergency capital funding, which is what eventually happened at the Holy Family school.

Recently, the DFES has not provided the full 90 per cent. of the funding, but only a proportion thereof. The funding gap had to be met from the school's own development formula capital. The argument is that this puts Church schools at a disadvantage. It could be argued that schools should insure for more than 10 per cent of the cost of replacing those buildings, but that would have obvious implications for the size of the premium they would have to pay, which in turn would affect other budgets for the worse.

At a more general level, I am told that there has been a significant recent reduction in the available funding for Church schools. It gets rather complicated here but I am sure that my hon. Friend will follow me. There are three main sources of funding: targeted capital funding—TCF; local education authority co-ordinated voluntary aided programmes—LCVAP; and devolved formula capital. DFC is for smaller capital work jobs and equates to approximately £28,000 per year for a one-form entry primary school and is scaled up for larger schools.

LCVAP is co-ordinated by the local education authority for voluntary aided schools and has been significantly reduced in the past year. It is used for larger-scale building work; say, of over £50,000. The example I quoted earlier would clearly fall into that category. TCF is for major projects in excess of £500,000. There are no new TCF bids this year and, as a consequence, any essential work has to be funded either from LCVAP or DFC pots. In many cases, the money is not there and in those cases where the money is there no other building work schemes that might involve repair and refurbishment work can go ahead. That was certainly part of the problem encountered at the Holy Family school.

The Catholic archdiocese has concluded that the TCF bids for 2004–05 resulted in only one successful voluntary aided bid in the north-west. I should say that the Liverpool archdiocese covers part of Lancashire: that is why I have referred to the north-west in the debate's title. The Liverpool archdiocese had a total of seven TCF bids in five of its constituent local education authorities. These schemes included a replacement school in Skelmersdale in Lancashire. My hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) is aware of this debate—unfortunately, he is chairing a meeting elsewhere in the building—but he has been in correspondence with the Department and is concerned about the matter.

This followed the closure of three separate primary schools and the removal of a significant number of surplus places. It also involved the single siting of two schools in two local education authorities, Liverpool and Sefton, both of which have separate infants and junior departments at least half a mile apart. In addition, within the Knowsley area, two schools identified by the Knowsley commission report for rebuild were also turned down despite being submitted by the same LEA team that was successful with the building schools for the future bid, to which I referred earlier.

In each case, significant surplus places would have been removed. I hope that that gives my hon. Friend an inkling of the voluntary aided schools' concerns. I do not want to be overly critical because I know that the Department is doing a good job in my area, but it would be timely if he could agree at least to a review of the way that the schemes work in relation to voluntary aided schools. I am sure that a review would ease the minds of governors and head teachers and the archdiocese and the diocese.

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. David Miliband): It is nice to serve under your chairmanship again, Mr. O'Brien. I am happy to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth) on securing the debate. I know that this is an issue about which he feels strongly. I had the privilege of visiting Knowsley on Thursday and of being able to talk to him and to some head teachers and LEA officials about the excellent work being carried out in some schools in the area. I also had the chance on Thursday to meet representatives of Catholic dioceses from all over the country, including Merseyside, and was able to discuss some of their perspectives on the issues that my hon. Friend has raised. I realise that a visit to Knowsley by a junior Minister from the Department for Education and Skills does not rival the occasion of a visit from the Prime Minister's wife, but I was happy with the reception that I received, muted and low-key though it was.

My hon. Friends the Members for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East and for Bootle (Mr. Benton) have been doughty and determined champions of their constituencies in general, and for education in them. I much appreciate their work to highlight the good practice in their schools.

Not all voluntary aided schools are faith schools. Equally, a lot of schools that are not voluntary aided but are classified, in the jargon, as having a religious character, fit under a foundation, community or voluntary controlled banner, but that is not what this debate is about. It is about how we can do our best to help all schools through capital spending.

There is agreement that the immediate problems with the restoration of Holy Family Catholic high school after the fire damage have been resolved reasonably expediently. Funding has been earmarked from our locally administered capital programme for voluntary aided schools to replace some temporary classrooms, but, in light of the unfortunate fire at the school, that money was temporarily redirected into helping with repairs. We also provided additional help by way of a significant emergency grant of almost £130,000. The good news is that, through the partnership between the local education authority and the Catholic diocese, funds have already been earmarked from next year's local programme to solve the problem of the temporary classrooms. I appreciate that that resulted in some delay in the work, which is an unfortunate consequence of the fire, but we cannot do everything at once, despite the record levels of capital investment going into our schools—up to £5 billion a year from 2005–06. Difficult choices have to be made.

My hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East legitimately raised the issue of the different labels under which capital is spent. I hope that I can explain it in a reasonably clear way—certainly one that is clearer than some of the acronyms that appear. Capital spending is distributed in three ways: for major city or town-wide capital refurbishment in the secondary sector, we have the building schools for the future programme, of which Knowsley is in the first wave; for smaller necessary projects, we have the targeted capital fund; and the third tranche of money is devolved to LEAs and schools through so-called devolved formula capital.

In Knowsley in 2005–06, the devolved formula capital was £1.2 million, which is not an insignificant sum by any stretch of the imagination, especially when one compares it to 2000–01, when it was a mere £261,000. I need hardly say that it was much lower in 1996–97. Those three types of capital spending are used to try to account for the different sort of spend that is necessary.

The voluntary aided sector is fully involved in the building schools for the future programme. Some 30 Catholic schools around the country are fully involved in the first wave of BSF, of which Knowsley is a part. The same goes for the targeted capital fund, as some of it is reserved for voluntary aided schools and for devolved formula capital, with which voluntary aided schools play their part.

The capital programme for all voluntary aided schools has increased fivefold in the past six years to more than half a billion pounds a year. That money is specifically dedicated to voluntary aided schools. Holy Family Catholic high school has received direct capital investment of more than £2 million since 1996–97—due, in part, no doubt, to my hon. Friend's doughty lobbying. It will also benefit from the BSF programme, and it is due to be rebuilt. That level of capital funding has given huge help to the sector, but it is also important to point out that there are further developments for maintaining progress. Perhaps what I have to say will deal with the point that he raised. A working group has been set up to consider issues relating to capital funding for the VA sector in particular, recognising its place in the framework of local schooling. We have already shared with the group all the information about how capital is allocated, and demonstrated the continuing funding pressures.

The arrangements for helping VA schools in the event of a fire or other loss have been in place since we reformed the capital funding arrangements for VA schools more than two years ago. Those reforms were agreed by voluntary aided sector representatives, and approved by Parliament through the regulatory reform order of 2001.

[Mr. David Miliband]

Where there is loss or damage, whether by fire, flood or other eventuality or calamity, the arrangement is that capital grant will be available to meet 90 per cent. of the costs. The governing body must have insurance to meet the remaining 10 per cent.—the 10 per cent. relates to the percentage of the work that VA schools must contribute themselves. That is part of the bargain with the voluntary aided sector. Interestingly, at my meeting with the Catholic dioceses on Thursday, they were very committed to that 10 per cent. contribution. They see it as part of the partnership between the voluntary aid of the Church and the state in respect of capital spending.

My hon. Friend raised the issue of whether we should examine insurance arrangements. I am happy to say that we shall do so at the next available appropriate opportunity. We welcome advice on whether to hold back money for such emergencies, but, obviously, that has implications. The danger is that the money is not spent.

I am pleased with the way in which the working group has begun its work. It includes representatives from all the major stakeholders in the voluntary aided sector, including head teachers. Another benefit of the group is that it can advise us on the balance of the capital programme for VA schools. My instinct is to move towards as simple as possible a method of funding distribution, but we also know that local ownership of, and engagement, with the spend is critical.

We know, too, that there are significant pressures that can be tackled only by a more targeted approach. Next month, we shall announce another major round of capital allocations, to April 2008. I am sure that the working group will help to inform us with respect to that programme. The group will also be helping us to ensure that the interests of the VA sector are properly reflected in the building schools for the future programme. That includes the decision-making arrangements to take account of the ownership responsibilities of the trustees of VA schools.

In conclusion, I thank my hon. Friend for his appreciation of the Department's work and for giving me the chance to give an account of the strength of the partnership between the VA sector nationwide and in his constituency. I look forward to continued progress on that basis.

Question put and agreed to.

Social Cohesion

[Relevant documents: Sixth Report from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister: Housing, Planning, Local Government and the Regions Committee, Session 2003–04, HC 45-I, and the Government's response thereto, Cm 6284.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Gillian Merron.]

2.30 pm

Andrew Bennett (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): I am grateful to have the opportunity to talk about the Select Committee report on social cohesion. First, I would like to put on record the thanks of the Select Committee to Ted Cantle and Andy Forbes, our specialist advisers, who did a great deal of work in getting the Committee to understand the issues so that we could ask the right questions. I also record my appreciation of all those who submitted evidence to the Committee, and those who were witnesses. Good Select Committee reports are very much dependent on the quality of the evidence that they receive. We were certainly very grateful for that. I place on the record too my appreciation of Martin Wilson, the principal clerk to the Northern Ireland Assembly, who, as the Assembly is suspended and had nothing to do, came over to spend some time helping the Select Committee. We were grateful to him, but sad that he was not over there ensuring that the Assembly was working.

Having mentioned Northern Ireland, I will start by referring to that place. Some of the most interesting evidence came from people who talked about the parallel societies in Northern Ireland—the Protestant and Catholic societies. Perhaps those societies developed as a result of deliberate actions, particularly by the Unionists, in the '30s, '40s and '50s, but much developed almost by accident or because people looked at the little picture rather than the big one. Someone who was particularly concerned with improving the health of children would simply consider that problem without looking at the bigger picture, so people ended up making provision for a health centre in both communities, making the division between the societies that little bit worse.

The fundamental message coming out of the inquiry that I want to convey is that the Government, local government, health services and everyone else have to test everything that they do with the question "Is this particular action going to improve social cohesion or make the division in societies that bit worse?" Are they creating parallel societies where people do not mix or share the same schools or health services, and end up with different goals and no understanding of the problems and issues in the rest of the community living close by? That is the strongest message I want to convey. Every action of the Government must be focused on ensuring that what they do improves social cohesion.

I would like to explain why the Select Committee carried out the inquiry. Following the disturbances in 2001, there was a great deal of activity and inquiry, and many promises were made that various things would happen. It seemed to the Select Committee in the summer of 2003 that it was a good time to look at what progress had been made as a result of those promises. We also recognised the fact that the issue was a wide one and that there was a danger that the Committee would not have a focus, so we decided to consider Oldham as a specific case study. In September 2003, the Select Committee spent a week there taking evidence. Having done that, it seemed important that we put that evidence into the context of the rest of the country, so in the spring of 2004 we took some further evidence in the House of Commons to supplement what we had seen in Oldham. On the whole, I want to concentrate today on the good news. We took a lot of trouble in the report to include 10 case studies of good practice, but there are many more examples of how communities ensure that social cohesion is effected in their areas.

I start with policing. One thing that was most worrying at the time of the disturbances was the reaction of the police force in some places. All the evidence from Oldham is that Chief Superintendent David Baines, who took his post after the disturbances, has made a huge difference. It is sad that, having spent three years in Oldham, he is now moving to another division in Greater Manchester, but everyone we talked to in Oldham was impressed with his efforts. I hope that Keith Bentley, who will take over as chief superintendent, will continue the good work.

When I spoke to my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) about what had happened with the police in Burnley, he emphasised that there had been a significant change in their approach and that they were much better at understanding and addressing the problems. I am not quite sure of the position in Bradford, but no doubt my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) will refer to it. One of the most positive things that has come out of Oldham and elsewhere is a better understanding by the police of the issues. In some cases, they have come up with imaginative responses in order to ensure that they work for social cohesion.

I draw attention to the opportunities for women centre, which we visited while going around Oldham. It works very hard to persuade women to return to education, to retrain and to gain extra skills. It works across the community and is doing very well. We were particularly impressed with the bus that it has provided in one of the ethnic minority communities to try to persuade women, particularly those who had come to marry in this country, to gain skills in English.

Another impressive service in Oldham is the post-16 provision. I suspect that it developed almost by accident. There is one sixth-form college and one further education college for the whole borough, so there are no divisions such as people from one ethnic background going to one school and those from a different ethnic background going to another. All the youngsters mix together and get an understanding of each other. I pay tribute to the people in Oldham. That borough used to have one of the poorest stopping-on rates, but the colleges seem to be doing extremely well.

[Andrew Bennett]

I pay tribute to the fire service in Oldham, which works hard to ensure that things such as smoke alarms are put into as many houses as possible. It has a multicultural approach and ensures that officers who are culturally sensitive go into homes to install them. There are many examples of good news.

I have slightly mixed feelings about school links. It is sad that in one school almost all the children are white and in another they all come from a different ethnic background. As far as I am concerned, it would be much nicer if the classrooms were mixed. However, given the way in which housing has become segregated, school links are at least an attempt to ensure that children from one school meet those from another two or three times a term and get some understanding of the issues.

Market renewal is another way to measure progress in Oldham; there is a problem, as there is in so many towns in the north of England, of empty and underused properties. I understand that there is quite a clamour in Oldham about the compulsory purchase of properties that are to be knocked down. It is interesting that indignation about the proposals comes from people of all ethnic backgrounds. There is not the feeling that one group of people is being treated unfairly or particularly advantageously. That is another example of the way in which things are improving in Oldham.

I was impressed with the evidence of the Leicester Mercury editor, Nick Carter, who worked hard to explain to the Committee his approach to journalism in Leicester and the way in which it appears to be increasing social cohesion in his community, rather than allowing one segment of the community to take action against another. That is also true of the chief constable of Leicestershire, who has a positive approach to social cohesion and race relations.

The West London Alliance also gave some very impressive evidence. There is a wide ethnic mix in west London, so rather than there being a majority and a minority, there is a wide spread of people from different backgrounds. The alliance takes that as a big advantage and makes sure that it uses in its community all the skills of people from different backgrounds, traditions and languages.

Today, I want the Minister to tell us about the current situation. The problem with a Select Committee is that it conducts an inquiry and comes up with recommendations, which the Government answer, but then things are forgotten if we are not careful. Sadly, in politics, one has to keep chipping away, so I will concentrate on the Government's response to the Select Committee report. In a way, I was pleased with the Government because they did not tell us to get lost and that we had got it wrong. They agreed with us on almost everything, and then said, "We are doing this, or that" to address it. I want to know how quickly they are doing those things.

My first question relates to recommendation 3, about the corporate assessment of local authorities. Will the Minister tell us where we are up to with that? One feeling that was put to us was that local authorities did not get much credit if they worked hard at social cohesion, and that they did not get much criticism if they did not. I understand that new details, to be announced next week, are to be put in the comprehensive performance assessments. Someone has hinted to me that they are still pretty feeble, and that the Government are not getting to grips with this issue. If local authorities are to be assessed, one thing that should be taken into account is how far, in all their activities, social cohesion is considered important.

A problem for Oldham is that its local authority is probably the least successful in Greater Manchester, and borders on being a weak one. The question is whether people should have been sent in to work on it. I understand that Oldham has just had its corporate assessment, and I hope—from the rumours that have reached me—that it will get some marks for significant improvement. It now has a pretty strong senior management team, which I hope will make some progress.

Ms Oona King (Bethnal Green and Bow) (Lab): On that point, I was delighted that my council in Tower Hamlets received beacon status last year for its work on community cohesion. The key lesson to be learned from Tower Hamlets is that, as my hon. Friend said, social cohesion must inform all service planning and service delivery, rather than being a bolt-on at which officers look when they are coming to the end of their delivery programmes.

Andrew Bennett: I accept that. My impression is that things are improving in Oldham, but I find it a little odd that the chief executive, Andrew Kilburn, who was in post before the riots, when the council was found to be doing so very badly, is still there—the Teflon man. I hope that the team he has put together will make things in Oldham much better.

I turn to recommendation 8 in our report and the Government's response, on what happens with local authorities and the local media. What was important in the evidence that we took from Nick Carter from the Leicester Mercury was that he understood clearly that the success of his paper would depend on its being read by people in the whole of greater Leicestershire—not just the city of Leicester but the whole area. He knew that he needed to work to encourage advertisers from the whole area and to encourage the readership. He appeared to be being very successful.

Oldham also has a local newspaper, the Oldham Chronicle. We are a little critical in our report because we are concerned that the Oldham Chronicle continues the practice of putting anonymous letters in its letters columns. Some of those letters are not good for social cohesion. When I pressed that matter with the editor, he assured me that he felt that free speech meant that letters should be put in. My view is that free speech is perfectly all right—a good and laudable aim—but that people should be asked to stand up and be counted. If they want a letter to go into the paper, they should be prepared to put their name to it.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): In some papers, letters are not only anonymous but from fictitious addresses. Some papers do not even go through the cursory process of checking that the people who have written to them actually exist.

Andrew Bennett: Although I fully accept that views should be in the paper if they exist, the important thing is that we should require a name and address to them so that others can check their veracity. I hope that the Oldham Chronicle will think about changing its policy.

On the other hand, I have a great deal of sympathy for the Oldham Chronicle in that the British National party in Oldham has been threatening it by trying to create advertisers' boycotts. I am delighted that the paper has been standing up to that, and that the people in Oldham have very firmly seen off the BNP in the elections. However, I want to emphasise to the editor of the Oldham Chronicle that it is important that he sets out to try to capture the readership of the whole community and does not rely on the traditional white population of Oldham—missing a great opportunity to bring in the whole community.

I want to say to the people of Oldham that the Oldham Chronicle really is a jewel in Oldham's crown because it is a local evening paper. I represent a nearby constituency that is partly in Tameside and partly in Stockport, and I wish that there were a local evening paper there. The message that I have for the Government concerns their promise, in response to us, to consider how they can improve relations between local authorities and the local media. Their response says:

> "The Home Office intends to explore this recommendation with local authorities and media representatives in the near future."

I am never quite sure when "the near future" is in Government-speak, and I should like to find out whether anything has happened in that regard.

Recommendation 17 is on multicultural schools. We were concerned that the performance in multicultural schools tended to be better than that in monocultural ones. However, there was not any actual evidence for that, so we asked the Government to do some work on it. We received a slightly snooty response, which said that the Department for Education and Skills

> "does not need to commission a survey, as it already holds the necessary data to conduct this kind of research and will carry out the analysis as suggested. The Department has consistent policies in promoting community cohesion in schools."

I would just like to find out what the Government are actually doing on that.

When trying to find information for today's debate, I noticed that Burnley has a bid in for new secondary schools, and I hope that the Government will look favourably on that. One key question is where those two new schools are to be located. What will their catchment areas be? Burnley could produce two good multicultural schools or it could end up with one school with a preponderance of people from one background and another with people from a different background. I know that the Minister is not directly responsible for this issue, but I want to find out how far the Department for Education and Skills works to ensure that the catchment areas of new schools are designed to encourage multicultural education, rather than ignoring it.

On recommendation 20 and funding, an awful lot of the things that we saw in Oldham and that were presented to us across the country as successes are done with funding that is available only for a short or specific period. The assumption is that the funding will then be taken over as mainstream funding. That worries me a great deal. Too many projects in Oldham and elsewhere, which do some of the best work on social cohesion, are living from hand to mouth. The people running those projects are not quite sure where the next funding will come from. I hope that the Government will address that.

Recommendation 27 is really about the effectiveness of the Commission for Racial Equality. Over the past 20 years, the CRE has not performed the role that people intended for it. It may have been effective in bringing some prosecutions and helping people with discrimination cases, but I regret that it has not done a lot more in a positive role. I just hope that the changes that I am told are under way will mean that the CRE plays a much more positive role in future. All public bodies now have to produce race relations strategies, but I hope that we shall not be just ticking them off and saying, "Yes, you've got a strategy—that's okay." We must look firmly at the quality of those strategies.

Other members of the Committee and I were concerned about choice-based lettings, which the Department has pressed hard. In their response, the Government explained at length why they thought that choice-based lettings were working. However, at the end they admitted that they were not absolutely certain what impact choice-based lettings have on race relations and social cohesion. Can the Minister give us an update on how choice-based lettings are working?

The experience from Stockport is that choice-based lettings are not working terribly well with groups of constituents who have particular views on life—never mind in terms of race relations. Some tenants can be quite keen to get their friends into a vacant property next door. It is fairly easy for people to make a noise and to look as though they are not the nicest tenants when others come round to view the property before the applications for choice are submitted. That way, people who might want to move in and who might have more points qualifying them for the house can sometimes be discouraged from making an application. If that can happen in a community where there is no ethnic tension at all, it could be worse where there are such tensions. I therefore ask the Government to look carefully at choice-based lettings.

Recommendation 43 is about the trials in 13 police forces. Can the Minister give us an update on that?

Finally, I draw attention to the problems with languages in some communities, particularly those that people enter as asylum seekers. The conclusion to the Government's response, entitled "Cross government discussions", says:

> "The Criminal Justice Service teams . . . are leading on a cross-government sector working group, which includes DH, to consider the scope for sharing interpreting resources and have organised one meeting to discuss the opportunity for joint working."

I hope that since the response was published they have had a second meeting, and I hope that on those points the Minister can tell us what progress is being made.

I stress the point about language skills. Places such as Burnley, Oldham and Bradford have a pretty good record of meeting the language needs of the local community, but they have often received a significant number of asylum seekers. For many, from different parts of the world, there are no people locally with the language skills to help them access services. There is concern that some strain has been put on the health service by having to find people with the language skills to ensure that someone receiving medical treatment is informed of what the doctor intends. There is an argument for making extra resources available nationally to meet the needs of those areas that have taken in significant numbers of asylum seekers and where the health service has had to provide translation services.

The Committee saw and heard from communities whose members come from a range of racial backgrounds, and in many there were no problems at all. In fact, some communities embraced that diversity of ethnic background with enthusiasm. I argue very strongly that if Britain is to be successful in the world economy, we must develop the skills of everyone in the nation and take advantage of the opportunities afforded us by our multicultural society. There are ample examples of good practice throughout the country, but sadly a few communities are not grasping those opportunities. They become inward-looking and allow themselves to become more divided. It is important that we appeal to those communities to see the advantage of developing a socially cohesive community. Finally, I say to the Government that every part of their every policy ought to be proofed to see whether it will encourage social cohesion or reduce it.

2.58 pm

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Bennett) and the Select Committee on producing a rigorous, thoughtful and informative report that will do a great deal to guide us when considering this important issue. I was pleased to hear him mention some issues in the south of England, although the report was motivated primarily by issues affecting northern towns and the explosion of tensions within them. I am pleased that the Committee considered the different aspects of social cohesion as they affect different parts of the country.

I want to concentrate my remarks on aspects of social cohesion that affect London and my constituency. As has been said, we do not have parallel societies there. We have a multiplicity of societies that are profoundly different from each other but that are often bracketed together under the broad title of black and ethnic minority communities.

The challenges of social cohesion are rooted in social change. We need to develop a wide range of social, economic and cultural responses to that social change and to ethnicity within it. I have discovered two particular dynamics: diversity and mobility. We have yet properly to recognise diversity in public policy terms. It is fundamentally different to work with and to deliver services to a society where 300 languages are spoken in the homes of residents, as is the case across London. In my constituency, 90 languages are spoken at home. The public policy mechanisms have progressed a long way over the past 20 to 30 years in response to modern Britain, but they have yet to reflect those differences.

For example, resource allocation often brings into play recognition of the number of people in minority communities and those with particular language needs, but has yet to take on board the challenges presented to those delivering services by that incredible range of backgrounds and experiences—not just languages but cultures and other issues. Housing management is probably the single biggest issue. It is possible to have a whole debate about how schools are affected. We are not discussing that, but it clearly needs to be recognised. It is not informing resource allocation or policy delivery in the way it should.

Mobility is beginning to be discussed and to be rewarded with resource allocation, but not to anything like the extent to which it should. Mobility and diversity are two sides of the same coin. In a society that is diverse, there is clearly likely to be a high population turnover. My constituency has the second highest population turnover in Britain. It is not uncommon for London constituencies—and possibly for city constituencies in other parts of the United Kingdom, although I stand to be corrected—to turn over at least a third of their electoral register every year. The electoral register is nothing like an accurate gauge of population mobility, because the most mobile populations will be those who never get on to it. To engage with a society with that level of mobility places demands on almost every part of public service and public life, which we must rise to. Those issues are the real underpinnings of the social cohesion agenda in cities, particularly in London and in areas such as my own.

What it all boils down to—this is the common thread with northern towns—is the battle for scarce resources. The total of scarce resources is different in London and the south-east from the total in northern towns, by and large—we are always generalising, but I think that that is true. However, the tensions that arise when one is battling for scarce resources are the same, although, as I said, diversity and mobility are the drivers of the pressures.

We end up with the poorest black and minority ethnic community residents and the poorest white residents, whether long-established or new arrivals, in intense competition for access to particular services. They are frequently locked together in some of our weakest neighbourhoods, which are least likely to create circumstances where they can lobby effectively to have their needs met.

I want to spend a moment or two talking about the good news. My hon. Friend was right to talk about good news, and there is a great deal. When it comes to the agenda of community safety, which is integral to effective social cohesion, we have moved so far from when I entered public life as a councillor 14 years ago that it is almost impossible to recognise what is happening on the ground.

I pay warm tribute to the policing delivery and policing strategy of recent years. It has made a remarkable difference. Even in the past few months, the introduction of neighbourhood policing in London wards, sometimes backed by Government-funded warden schemes introduced under the neighbourhood renewal fund, has quickly galvanised communities into becoming involved in community safety. One can see a palpable difference in how the safety agenda is being delivered.

That change is due not only to the police bearing down on crime and antisocial behaviour, important though it is, but to the fact that the recruitment and retention of the newer police teams, police community support officers and wardens more closely reflect a diverse community than traditional policing. That is enormously important, and if it starts feeding through into a more diverse police force, it will be welcome.

It is worth putting on record that, even at a time of increased tension in our Muslim communities because of anti-terror legislation over the past year or two and because of an increase in the stopping and searching of Muslim youths, the Muslim cultural heritage centre, one of the leading centres in my constituency, reports enormously positive relations with the police. I am always anxious to gauge the centre's concern, and glad to find that it is not a problem. That is very welcome.

The area-based work being done through a number of initiatives that have come on stream over the years is paying off. It is taking time, and only relatively recently have we begun to see some real feedback on its value. I think of the new life for the Paddington single regeneration budget programme, a number of other small single regeneration budgets, the Sure Start programmes, the children's centres, and the education action zones. Particularly important is the work being done by the two arm's-length management organisations. Taking a step away from council control, they have been much more responsive. They have stepped beyond the traditional bricks and mortar and rent collection functions and become more integrally involved in the social cohesion agenda.

On the Westminster side of my constituency, we have recently seen the development of neighbourhood forums, which are grassroots-based and proving their worth in terms of individual participation. It is not on the scale that we would like. None the less, it is much more representative.

I pay particular tribute to the neighbourhood management programme. One of the Government's neighbourhood management schemes is being run in Church Street, the most deprived ward in my constituency and one of the most deprived single output areas in the country. That sort of work is critical in creating a strategy for tackling social exclusion and building social cohesion in a diverse community.

All that is wonderful, but it leaves us with a couple of critical problems. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning will not be remotely surprised to hear me say that housing is the single most important problem, and that housing resources have reached the crunch point. That is where the tension occurs between minority communities and white communities—and, indeed, settled black communities. It is each against the other because of the pressure on scarce resources. Housing supply has plummeted in the social rented sector over the past 20 years, homelessness has risen dramatically, and the number in temporary accommodation has risen, with more than 60,000 in London.

Overcrowding is soaring out of control and, most critically, it is concentrated in black and minority ethnic communities. Homelessness has risen twice as fast among black and white minority ethnic communities as in the rest of the population. Twice as many black and Asian families as white are in properties unfit for human habitation. Overcrowding is six times higher among black and minority ethnic communities.

A powerful local study was undertaken in my constituency. If my right hon. Friend the Minister has not seen it, I ask him to read it as a special favour to me. It was carried out by the North London Muslim housing association, and a copy can be found in the Housing Corporation library. It is called "Understanding the Housing Needs and Aspirations of Muslim Communities". It was researched in north Kensington and it makes such depressing reading that it makes one's ear bleed. It shows an incredible concentration of disadvantage in that 90 per cent. of Muslims in north Kensington live in social housing, and more than half live in overcrowded housing.

However, importantly for the social cohesion agenda, at present and in the foreseeable future, there is a powerful sense of community and of family ties within the Muslim communities and also among white, black and other families with children growing up. They want to stay rooted in the area. A housing policy that is based on increasing mobility and moving people out to meet their housing needs will increase social fragmentation, disadvantage and resentment. When a family—whether it is a white family, a Moroccan or an Iraqi family—are living in chronically overcrowded housing with no means of escape, or in temporary accommodation with no hope of that coming to an end, if they feel that their housing predicament is in part caused by other people getting preference, or if they are required to leave the area to have those needs met, that builds quite extraordinary resentment.

If we are to take further steps forward on promoting social cohesion in areas such as mine, we need to take a fresh look at housing supply and the characteristics of those communities, and to make a clear commitment to meet those needs in communities across London and the south-east, rather than simply moving people into lower-cost or growth areas in particular pockets.

Clearly, there are issues of concentrated poverty, discrimination, disadvantage and unemployment in those neighbourhoods that are most fragmented, polarised and diverse. We have not yet found good ways of overcoming that on the scale that is needed. In particular, we need to worry about some of the strategies that we employ in areas such as child care delivery and employment service delivery. We are in serious danger of hanging so many of our policies on labour market participation that we overlook the needs of the very poorest and most disadvantaged, who are not currently in employment.

We are not making enough investment in outreach, community or neighbourhood-based development strategies to meet the needs of those communities. One of the examples is the fact that, of the 120 employment service districts across the United Kingdom, only a third work with housing providers to get into local communities and to reach people where they are. The corollary of that is that those households that are in social housing are least likely to be in the labour market. That is partly because we are not reaching them through all the different mechanisms that are available to us.

I want to talk about where we need to go in the future. In terms of future funding to meet social cohesion and social exclusion goals, it is a worry that—I do not know whether the Minister will be able to respond to this point—as we reach the end of projects such as single regeneration budgets, we are not replacing them with schemes that tackle capacity building in communities. Again, the projects are very labour market based. While I am in favour of anything that we can do to increase labour market participation, if we do not continue with the resources that underpin those neighbourhood forums and that support the more neighbourhood and community-based aspects of the work, we are in danger.

An aspect of that is the worry that, unless resources are increased, as we roll things such as the neighbourhood renewal fund and children's centres away from the most deprived communities, the spread will undermine the intensity of help that we can deliver in the most deprived communities. We have certainly not yet reached the point at which our most deprived communities can say that we have lifted them to an acceptable level of service.

I, like others, for shorthand, talk about black and minority ethnic communities. For me, the largest, fastest growing and the most disadvantaged communities are Muslim, but it is very important that we get beneath the skin of these communities, do the numbers and produce the needs assessments that we do not yet have.

In Muslim communities in my constituency, which are defined by faith but not by ethnicity, there are Bangladeshis, Pakistanis, Moroccans—in fact, most of Britain's Moroccan community—Yemenis, Kosovans, Somalis, Sudanese people, Egyptians, Algerians and Libyans. Almost every nationality on earth is represented. There are also greatly varying levels of participation in faith as well as no participation. We know next to nothing about the subject. Even in Kensington, North, we have no reliable assessment of how many Moroccans there are in the Moroccan community.

We cannot assess the needs of these communities if we have no assessment of how many types of communities there are, who they are and what their particular needs and issues are. The Moroccan community, for example, would have an entirely different agenda from the Kosovan communities, which are Muslim but tend not to be faith-based. We cannot tell the difference from the figures.

The Government need to make progress and to require local agencies to carry out much more rigorous assessments of the building blocks of all our different communities, so that we can be sure that we are meeting all those individual and very disparate needs, even if they tend to come under the single umbrella of disadvantage.

3.17 pm

Ms Oona King (Bethnal Green and Bow) (Lab): It is always a great pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck). She began by reiterating the diversity and mobility issues of modern-day multicultural Britain. Our diversity has increased but our social cohesion has decreased, and part of today's debate is about seeing how we can reverse that trend.

I start by paying tribute to my former colleagues on the Urban Affairs Sub-Committee of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister for another thought-provoking report. It manages to reflect some of the raw frustration felt by the communities, yet also manages to be jam-packed with policy proposals. I know that the Committee was well served by Ted Cantle in his capacity as adviser. The report clearly reflects some of his frustration at the slow progress in implementing the recommendations detailed in his taskforce's report into the summer 2001 disturbances in Burnley, Bradford and Oldham. The excellent report produced by Ted Cantle and his fellow community cohesion review team members in December 2001 should have enabled us to make better progress than we have. No one imagines that there are quick fixes or short cuts to developing community cohesion, but we can and must do more.

I want to return briefly to the subject of my intervention. My local authority, Tower Hamlets, has been awarded beacon status for its work in supporting community cohesion. The key lesson for Tower Hamlets has been that social cohesion needs to be built into and to inform all service planning and service delivery. However, I am not here to say that we have got this cracked or that we know all the answers. Clearly, we do not. The riots in Burnley, Oldham and Bradford act as a wake-up call to us all. They certainly forced me to look even closer at the community that I represent and in which I live.

East London has many advantages that are not shared in the towns that experienced those riots in the summer of 2001. We have the City, the west end and docklands on our doorstep, along with all the employment opportunities that they bring. We have a longer history of large-scale immigration, from the French protestant Huguenots in the 17th century to the eastern European Jews in the late 19th century, and our tradition started with the Normans at the Tower of London quite a long time before that. Yet both the Cantle report and the Select Committee inquiry found that Tower Hamlets has problems of racial segregation similar to those in many northern mill towns. In the early 1990s, there was huge resentment about Liberal Democrat-promoted regeneration of predominantly white estates. Now that some of the predominantly Bangladeshi estates are finally being regenerated, there is resentment among a significant part of the white community. We have a continuing undercurrent of racially motivated violence, harassment and verbal abuse, which leaves the most vulnerable living in fear and misery. Those who suffer are white as well as black, Christian as well as Muslim. That is why we recognise that we have no cause for complacency.

I want to talk in detail about three key issues that were mentioned in the Committee's report: education, youth provision and housing. Before I do so, I must commend the Government's commitment—indeed, the renewed personal commitment of the Prime Minister—to outlaw incitement to religious hatred. Taking a strong stand on that will harm extremists on both sides, from Abu Hamza to people such as Nick Griffin of the BNP. The issue should have been dealt with during the passage of the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000. As it stands, the law allows right-wing extremists to incite hatred against faith groups. That legal loophole has been exploited mercilessly to incite hatred against the Muslim community in particular. The new law will not stop that overnight, and it will certainly not guarantee that my Bangladeshi and Somali constituents do not face Islamophobia and bigotry in future. However, it will help us to weed out and challenge those who peddle their racist message of hatred towards Islam and to individual Muslims. It will also be a signal to the Muslim community that it is not fighting racists alone. The overwhelming majority of decent British people want to see Muslims treated as equals, and stand with them against the racists, just as the overwhelming majority of decent Muslims stand with British people such as Ken Bigley when extremists bring so much grief to communities around the globe.

Five years ago, a racist exploded a nail bomb in Brick lane, in the heart of Britain's Bangladeshi community. It was designed to maim and kill men, women and children. It was also designed to provoke a reaction from Muslims in east London—to start a race war on the streets. Many have been astonished that it did not provoke such a war. In fact, it was the mature, wise and measured reaction of the whole Muslim community, particularly those in positions of leadership such as in the nearby Brick lane mosque, that helped to bring east Londoners of all ethnic backgrounds together in a stand against racists, rather than allowing themselves to be driven apart. Outlawing incitement to religious hatred will give the state the tools that it needs to tackle those who spread hate through this legal loophole. Ultimately, it will have a practical significance on the ground.

Turning to education, I have mentioned before in Parliament my shock at visiting two schools next door to each other soon after I was elected, in 1997. They shared a playground with a fence down the middle. On one side of the fence there were white children playing with a smattering of Afro-Caribbeans, and on the other there were brown, Muslim and Bangladeshi children. Perhaps it is because my father was brought up in the segregated south that I was so horrified by that; I could not believe it. We read about such things, but when we see them in Britain, we must think that something is seriously wrong. Everybody—the Select Committee, the Government and others who have considered the issue—realises that there is something very wrong with that. One of the key tools that we have for trying to deal with that problem is a more cohesive education system—bringing together children who are currently kept apart by education policy, as they were previously by housing policy.

I want to draw attention to the Select Committee's recommendations 18, 19, 20 and 23, which address that matter. Recommendation 18 highlights the > "conflict between parental choice and social cohesion" that can sometimes occur. Recommendation 19 says that the Department for Education and Skills

> "should provide additional guidance to faith schools on how to address social cohesion", and says:

> "No new faith schools should be approved unless they are committed to promoting a multicultural agenda."

I should say that that needs to apply to new Christian schools, new Islamic schools and new Jewish schools—obviously, any faith school, not just one in particular.

Recommendation 20 asks the DFES and local education authorities to see twinning initiatives between schools

> "as part of core funding for schools", and to put those on a long-term basis. That is very important because one-off contacts do little to move beyond initial stereotypes. Recommendation 23 is on Ofsted inspections, and asks Ofsted to consider > "the way social cohesion is addressed by education authorities and also within schools."

I support all those recommendations, and hope that the Government will take action on them.

On youth provision, the Cantle report stressed the importance of youth services, both in promoting contact between youngsters from different ethnic backgrounds and in reaching out to those who are disaffected. It recommended something for which many of us have been calling for a long time: that youth services be put on a statutory footing. The Select Committee repeated that recommendation. The report also highlighted the need substantially to increase funding. I shall turn to housing in a moment, but I have to say that much of the previous Parliament and Labour's first term in government was characterised by Labour Back Benchers stamping their feet and banging their fists together, demanding that more money go into housing. The Government responded to that in a significant way. Were there to be a third Labour term in government—I sincerely hope that there will be—the issue of youth provision would need to be at the very top of the agenda.

The Government's response to the recommendations is another matter that I think needs a second look. The Secretary of State already has a statutory power to intervene if he feels that a local authority is failing to deliver sufficient services. In Tower Hamlets, for example, we spend the most money per pupil—or, rather, per young person—of any London borough, yet I can say as the local MP that we do not have anything approaching sufficient youth provision. That has been recognised by the Home Office. It gives us what we might term emergency youth provision in the summer months because it recognises that all hell might break loose if it does not do so.

We acknowledge that the potential resources available from the youth and community sub-block of the local education authorities' education spending settlement have increased by an average of 5 per cent. on last year. This Government have always increased resources for local authorities in a way that, frankly, has not happened since the second world war. Yes, they have done incredibly well if we measure it against that provided under former Governments, whether Conservative or Labour, but they still have not done well enough. It is clear that local authorities are tailoring their services in line with the Government's limited ambition for expanding youth services, and I implore Ministers to take a much stronger lead.

Ms Buck: Given what my hon. Friend has said, and given that schools and neighbourhoods do not necessarily coincide and that schools that draw from a wider catchment area may not be drawing children from their own neighbourhood, does she agree that perhaps the Government should carefully consider how the extended school model will develop? If the out-of-school activities are to be based on schools, we will need to be extremely careful to ensure that they do not miss the needs of disadvantaged groups in the neighbourhoods.

Ms King: My hon. Friend points to an important aspect of the Government's plans for providing, among other things, extended child care facilities, and for using schools as a mechanism for delivering some type of social cohesion in the neighbourhood. If schools in areas where there are segregated communities just replicate the segregation, we will not certainly achieve what the Select Committee report encourages us to do: reduce social exclusion.

We do not need youth services just during the summer months when young people are most likely to be out on the streets. Likewise, we do not win over the hearts and minds of young people if the services grind to a halt in the first week of September. We must extend the provision that is available during the summer holidays to the whole year.

Moving on to housing, the Cantle report noted the pivotal role of housing and identified in particular that the > "impact of housing policies on community cohesion seems to have escaped serious consideration to date."

It is certainly true that the shortage of affordable housing is a key factor causing tension between different communities. My hon. Friend has just outlined the negative impact that it can have. The Government's £22 billion communities programme is changing the situation, but lack of affordable housing and its entanglement with social exclusion is not a new issue. As I said, we in Tower Hamlets are still trying to deal with some of the consequences of allocation policies that prevented overcrowded and homeless Bangladeshi families from getting the homes that they needed. We have been thinking about the impact of housing allocations on community cohesion for longer than most councils, which is why on this one point I am less supportive of the Select Committee's criticism of the new choice-based lettings scheme for social housing.

I was a little reassured to note that the Select Committee's criticism is not quite as outspoken as it was represented in the press. Unlike Ministers, I would not necessarily disagree that there is a but I do think that the days of telling people that they can take the flat that they are offered or lump it must come to an end. That is part of the rationale behind the new housing choice programme.

> "tendency for freedom of choice to lead to greater segregation",

It is true that many of my constituents feel that they do not have a choice. When there are between 17,000 and 20,000 people on the housing waiting list, in reality there is no choice. None the less, Tower Hamlets is successfully piloting choice-based lettings. The process is still frustrating for many families, but it is better than what went before.

There is merit in the Select Committee's recommendation that states:

> "Any choice-based lettings policy should include a strategy which included encouragement for greater integration by offering support to tenants moving into areas where they might be in a minority."

I hope that the Minister will say today—or write to me if he cannot do so—what more the Government plan to do to help councils put into practice that recommendation, which suggests that families who move into areas where they might be a minority should be offered greater support. In my constituency, that would affect families from all communities.

I wish to end by mentioning inequality. Catalyst has published an excellent pamphlet. It argues cogently that countries with high levels of inequality have lower levels of social cohesion. In other words, it is not enough just to do what we have to date been successful in doing—increasing minimum standards for the most disadvantaged. If we are serious about reducing social exclusion, we must also consider the negative impact that extreme inequality has on social cohesion. There are only three countries in the pre-enlarged European Union that are less equal than the United Kingdom. They are Spain, Portugal and Greece.

Britain has, as its aim, an inclusive society. That is what the Government want and although the issue would—I hope—be a subject for another debate, I leave hon. Members with the thought that if we are to tackle social cohesion over the long term, in the next decade or so we must also reduce inequality in Britain.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am delighted to comment on the report. I am sure that some hon. Members will think that I have a cheek to do so, because it deals with urban deprivation and the riots, but I make two simple points.

First, the problems that the report identifies are exactly the same problems that rural Britain suffers from. I speak as a member of, but not on behalf of, a Labour committee of Back-Bench rural MPs. There is a great myth out there that urban problems and rural problems are distinct. I do not say that the problems in my constituency are on anything like the same scale as those in Oldham, where the riots took place. I do not even say that we can use the same policies. However, the problems are common and we must get away from the notion that they are very different.

One of the problems creating the different perception, which is related to the way in which the excellent Select Committee operates in looking at the urban side of things, is that we have our own Department—the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs—and a Select Committee to shadow it. To our eternal shame, by the time we have dealt with farming, fishing, environmental issues, food—you name it—rural affairs have, as some of us feared, been shunted down the agenda. To be fair, the ODPM Select Committee has done a much better job at evaluating and highlighting what is happening in its domain than we have. That is a pure apology for the fact that we are, to some extent, letting down our communities. I hope that there is a dialogue and, although I do not want to labour the point, that is why I am speaking.

My second point is that there is a myth that there is greater cohesion in rural Britain. I do not say that all rural communities are divided. We have our views on hunting and that is no doubt a debate that anyone could take sides on. However, I represent some rural communities that are far from cohesive and that are becoming less so for the simple reason why it is becoming difficult for anyone of lower means to live there anymore. In one sense, those communities are indeed cohesive, because we have excluded people on lower incomes. However, there is a dysfunctionality in parts of rural Britain and if we ignore it, we will be as guilty as we would be for over-blowing the same problem in urban Britain. Those are the reasons why I want to speak. We must look at our country in a way that makes sense of what is happening.

The scale of the problems in rural Britain is different and the way we deal with them must inevitably involve different degrees of sensitivity. However, we must always exercise commonality in approaching such problems.

For example, everyone thinks that the education in rural primary schools is much better. Lots of people try to get their children out of primary schools in my more urban areas into rural primary schools. That is fine if they have transport or are middle class with money. If not, the children go to the local primary school.

Many things influence us politicians, but rarely do we feel shocked. One of the things that shocked me in my early days was talking to the head of a relatively small rural primary school. He talked me through the situation. One of his biggest problems was that, when the SATs results came out and the teacher assessment was done, the results were, in some years, not as good as people thought they should be—certainly not as good as middle-class parents thought they should be who sent their children to the school.

That is because there was a block of council houses in that community. Many people in the community never went down that street. They never identified with those children, who were good, traditional farming kids, whose view was that, while they would do what work they needed to, they knew—at least, they used to—where they were going in employment terms. However, the level of pressure on the head to pretend that it was a cohesive school where everyone came from a middle-class background, and then to explain to people that not all children at the school were middle class, was threatening. Schooling is just one of many issues.

My right hon. Friend is the Minister for Housing and Planning and I could go on about housing, but we have had exclusive access to one another in recent weeks, so I will give him an easy time. The classic points centre on which difficulties we face. Because there is much rundown housing in rural Britain, we presume that that is where people of lower means are able to afford housing. Of course, the opposite is happening. Much of that housing is being altered—two cottages are being knocked into one and larger properties are being restored. Therefore, there are problems of access and affordability. We have debated that on other occasions.

Local services are an interesting issue. In the same way that there are problems with the Post Office in urban and suburban Britain, there are problems in rural Britain, except that it is much more difficult in rural areas because the service starts from a much lower base. That is why we feel that pain as much as, if not more than, our urban colleagues. The point about local services is that it is even more important that communities own them because once they disown them there is no return. That is also in contrast with what happens in more urban centres.

I speak as an MP who represents five market towns. To people who live in the villages, that is urban Britain. That is still true, not so much in the Strouds of this world, but—dare I say it—in the Forest of Dean. When I taught in the Forest of Dean, there were 11-year-old children who had never been to Gloucester. We always think that people are worldly-wise and have been to many places but it is a bit of a myth. People are still locked into their local cultures.

Let me address the issue of race. It is easy, and I would love, to launch an immediate attack on Trevor Phillips. From my experience of Trevor, he would not know a rural area from one end to t'other. I do not want to rehearse the arguments, but he made the point that there is evidence of racism in rural Britain. Much of that evidence is totally anecdotal, but, if one considers the figures for my constituency, which are in the Library—anyone can identify them—one discovers that the ethnic minority population is very small. Those that are there have settled well.

It is easy to say but, in terms of the Government's asylum policy, there is an argument that goes, "Why not let more asylum seekers into rural Britain?" People forget that I live in a community where, on the back of our problems in Egypt in 1956, we built a block of houses for those who had to get out of Egypt because of the Suez crisis. They still live in my community. In fact, I am still trying to get one of them citizenship because she does not have a passport, but that is another matter. In previous times, we have brought people into rural communities in Britain. The sad thing is that an implicit racism exists in the sense that it is more difficult for people of different cultures to arrive and settle.

I have two brief stories. It cheered me up that the black church in Stroud—there are not that many black faces in Stroud—was able to work with other Christian communities to establish itself eventually. That is one of the most moving stories one could hear. There is a small Muslim community in Stroud, which is trying to find a place to establish a mosque. I will just say it is not easy. That is a matter not just of attitudes, but of money and finding a suitable location. Such problems exist, and let us not pretend—as some do when they talk about racial tensions—that it is a white, working-class problem in urban areas. I sometimes have to be very deaf to the views of better off people concerning what should happen to asylum seekers. If those comments were made in Oldham, they would be undoubtedly considered as straight BNP bigotry. It is not quite the same in rural areas, but there are problems.

We should not divide our society up into an urban part, with all its problems, and a rural part that takes care of itself. It is not like that. I could launch into a whine about how resources are allocated; rural areas traditionally think themselves under-provided for. That is a bit of a myth because we do very well. There is cross-subsidisation, but the problem is that, for the same amount of money in rural Britain, one can buy an awful lot more than one can in urban Britain, so there are not the same economies of scale.

The report has highlighted a dysfunctionality very clearly that we must analyse across the board and deal with in slightly different ways, but deal with it we must. The Government have a good record in rural Britain. I know that we will be attacked by other parties on that, perhaps even today, but we have tried to do things differently. Nevertheless, the problems have been common, which is why I have spoken today.

There are some good things, such as the local strategic partnerships, which in Stroud's case have worked very well. That is down to the Government encouraging us to carry out community development differently. We must do that. It is up to rural communities in Britain to take the lead, as it is for communities in urban Britain, but let each always hold out the hand of friendship to the other. People move between rural and urban communities, and it is important to note that. That is why I have spoken today, and I make no apology for it. I hope that it was meaningful, and that the two Select Committees might carry out parallel investigations, so that we can learn from each other.

3.48 pm

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North) (Lab): It is very unusual to speak from this position, but I am glad to take part in the debate on the Select Committee report. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Bennett) on the report. I should highlight one glaring factual error, which I pointed out this morning. Page 8 says that Herman Ouseley produced a report on the Bradford riots. He did not. He was commissioned a year before to produce a report on race relations in the city. The riots happened on 7 July 2001 and his report was published on 12 July 2001. It has been generally presumed that that was a report on the riots—how he could have done it in four days, I do not know.

Nevertheless, 7 July 2001 was a black day in the history of Bradford. The pictures that were flashed around the world were tragic. They massively damaged confidence in the city, drove away potential investors and appalled members of the public in Bradford, whatever their background.

When people come to Bradford, they are often told that we have a proud history of welcoming immigrant communities going back 150 to 200 years. During the 1850s and 1860s, Irish people came and, in the late 19th century, so did east European Jews. After the second world war, Polish, Estonian and Lithuanian people arrived, and subsequently, people from the subcontinent and the Caribbean. In the early 1970s, significant numbers of Vietnamese refugees came into the country.

Refugees have not always been welcomed, however. In the 1850s, St. Patrick's church on White Abbey road would have been the first Catholic church in Bradford had it not been burned down several times by rioting Anglicans who were determined to stop a papal invasion. In the late 19th century, when east European Jewish people came over, the synagogue that they were trying to build was burned down three times by people who were trying to stop them settling in the city. It has not always been pleasant. Nevertheless, those communities were established and they integrated in society. They had one big advantage, however—they were white. They did not stand out. That has not been the case over the past 30 years.

The Cantle report struggles to define social cohesion or community cohesion, and no doubt a number of PhD theses are being written about that throughout the country. It is difficult to identify. One thing that concerned me in the report was its discussion of segregated communities—as though some external force akin to South Africa corralled people into particular areas. That is just not true. As with all migrant communities, when people came from the subcontinent, they moved into the cheapest housing; it is standard for all migration around the world. They have never managed to escape from that poorest housing.

In Bradford, 26,000 occupied houses, largely in the inner city, are unfit for habitation. There are authorities in the north—I am not complaining—that are receiving market renewal money compulsorily to purchase and demolish empty properties that are blighting the market. Those houses in Bradford are unfit for habitation but occupied, and often over-occupied. The prevalence of diseases associated with over-occupation in such communities is high. One can understand when communities wonder why those matters cannot be dealt with.

The report talks a lot about schools. We must recognise that 99 per cent. of parents send their child to the nearest school. We have schools in Bradford where the catchment area is two or three streets around the school, and then it is full. I am not complaining, but the problem has been exacerbated by the limit on class sizes for five, six and seven-year-olds—30 kids in a class and if another one comes along, they have to find somewhere else.

We also have the problem that appertains to two or three years ago. A huge area of the inner city was not in any secondary school catchment area. Inner-city children were left with the places at schools that no one else wanted to go to. They often had to travel some seven miles, and that does not inspire migrant communities to think that they are welcome and valued. They think that they are being put at the bottom of the barrel.

I am not making a political point, but undoubtedly the breakdown between the Government and the teaching unions in the mid-1980s was a tragedy for social cohesion. The ending of school sports, culture and arts activities and exchanges meant that schools became ever more isolated from each other. The Government have introduced a programme of community physical education, with 40,000 coaches, which will go a long, long way. However, most competitive sport in schools is aimed at boys. Girls must be included as well. Through the avenues of sport, culture and arts, we can achieve engagement between schools and children, and get some contact going.

The Bradford cricket league is widely regarded as one of the best in the country, going back decades. Virtually every test player from Yorkshire started in the Bradford league. About 60 per cent. of cricketers in the Bradford league are from the Indian subcontinent. Not one of them, despite their skills and abilities, has ever been adopted by the Yorkshire county cricket club, even at trainee level. They have gone to other counties. Those have taken them on and they have gone into the first team. One or two have played at international level.

There is only one name for that: deep-rooted, embedded racism in Yorkshire county cricket club. If we bear in mind that the club has not been particularly successful in the past 10 or 20 years, it is not a right good policy either. There are resources in our communities that are not being used and that reinforces the sense of a second-class community.

The report examines at length something that was a particular issue in Oldham—regeneration and area-based initiatives that set one community against another. The history of the single regeneration budget was of each community having to prove that it was more crime-ridden, more debt-ridden, more poverty-ridden and had more ill health and disease than the next one. As an exercise in building self-esteem, that is not very good.

That situation lasted seven years. Every year, two communities, usually a black one against a white one, would bid for that year's round. That did not do anything to engender good community relations. I am glad that we are moving away from that and considering things more thematically. The themes that are relevant to one community are often very different from those that are relevant to another. It is not a simple solution, but it would be a move forward.

We need to recognise that, probably since the original community programme of the 1970s, which people who were around in those days may remember, successive Governments have—there is no nice way of putting this—tried to buy off trouble by throwing grants at minority communities. That has patently failed.

Too often, it has been the old story: a grant for three years means having to find someone to pick up the funding afterwards. Sometimes, local authorities took it on. Sometimes, they did not. If they did, it lasted for three years and then it was out of the way. However, it seemed to people on the outside that the chance of accessing those funding streams was several times higher for people in a minority community than for people in a white community. The record will bear that out quite a long way.

Where do we go to take things forward? We need to try to get something across to people. I had a brief chat with my friend the Minister—and he is my friend—this morning. We need to engage with communities, so that people recognise their commonality of issues and problems. The issue is much more to do with class than race. I know that that sounds a bit old Labour and is perhaps old-fashioned, but it is a fact.

The problems that people have on poor white council estates equate to those of the poor Bangladeshis, Kashmiris or other people who live in our inner cities. They include poverty of aspiration and ambition, lack of educational opportunities and discrimination in the workplace. There are no end of addresses on council estates in Bradford where, if someone tries to get credit, they are immediately ruled out once they give the address. They do not even go through the credit scoring. The address is taken and that is a no-no.

We need people to realise that they are essentially in the same boat, but that different, additional pressures apply in each community. We need to have avenues that allow people to talk and discuss things with each other. In Bradford, we have a neighbourhood forum system, which works pretty well. Conveniently, communities overlap in a number of areas. Among the people who engage in the process, we get a great deal of understanding and progress. The trouble is that not enough people take part, and we need to see how we can expand that.

The more people talk to each other, discuss things and realise that they have not got two heads, or nine wives, or whatever the myths are, the more we can take things forward. However, we have an incredible problem in this country—I do not know how we can deal with it, and it is one area in which I will disagree with the Select Committee—with the way in which the media have portrayed asylum seekers and have demonised communities from around the world, and with their whole agenda about Islamophobia, terrorism and everything.

Not once in the 30-odd years of trouble in Northern Ireland did anybody say that Catholic terrorists were responsible, yet news programmes repeatedly use the phrase "Islamic terrorists". We have a situation where white communities think that every Muslim is a potential terrorist, Muslim communities think that every white person will attack them because they think that they are a terrorist, and resident communities feel threatened by the reaction of the media and of other people to incomers who are asylum seekers. That is not a recipe for people being at ease with each other. It is a recipe for social uncohesion, not for cohesion.

How do we get the media to be more responsible? The report suggests that "local authorities and other local agencies use their advertising and promotional budgets to encourage the local media to promote social cohesion".

That sounds a bit like blackmail, like saying, "If you don't print this, we'll withdraw our advertising." I may have misread it, but that is a bit of a dodgy way to go. Something needs to be done about the way in which the media, particularly some of the red tops, portray the issues. One used to expect a higher standard from the broadcast media, not least because of the regulations, but some are slipping a long way from what one would regard as acceptable standards.

Andrew Bennett: I think the Committee was keen to emphasise the evidence from Nick Carter of the Leicester Mercury, who made it clear that, for his newspaper to succeed, he had to appeal to the whole of the community. In appealing to the whole of the community, he was after their advertising and after their readership. He wanted more good stories about social cohesion, rather than bad stories, and his experience was that that sold newspapers.

Mr. Rooney: We need to impress on people the economic benefits not only of a resident mixed community, but of employing and engaging with those communities. About a year ago, I hosted an event in Bradford attended by 250 companies. They were quite staggered to learn of the purchasing power of the minority communities in Bradford. Organisations such as Tesco, Sainsbury's and Morrison's realised long ago that, if they were going to attract customers from those communities, they needed to have people working for them who were from those communities: it was not altruistic, but economic. In a number of banks, building societies and similar organisations, we now see at least as many ethnic minority faces as indigenous. There are all sorts of levers that we should use that are not about legislation. Legislation has a role, but all that it can do is to punish people if they do not do what we want them to, whereas we need to change people's minds and attitudes.

[Mr. Rooney]

My next point—I see that the Minister has his defence all ready—is that last year, the Government gave £539 million to local authorities nationally for youth services, but local authorities spent only £300 million: 60 per cent. of what the Government gave them. I do not know about my colleagues, but I get extremely fed up—I nearly used a word that I should not—with every patch of grass in the constituency having a "No ball games" sign on it. Kids are being driven away from areas on which people have played for decades. I am not boasting about this, but I grew up in a poor family on a white council estate with a patch of grass in front. In the winter months, that was our Wembley, and in summer it was our Lords. If we had not had that, I do not know what we would have done, but I do not think that we would have been up to much good. If we continually deprive children of places to play and meet, we will reap the reward that we will deserve.

Bradford city council—God bless it—has just decided to take somewhere between £2.3 million and £3 million, depending on how one looks at it, out of its community budget. Notionally, that is a local authority decision and, therefore, not the Minister's responsibility, but actions such as that impact on the community plan, the neighbourhood renewal plan and the local strategic partnership plan, and undermine lots of initiatives that are about building social cohesion, so it is an issue for the Government. I hope that representations are being made through the Government office that it is a direct dereliction of the commitments that councils have made to the Government to deliver on floor service targets in poor areas.

In our authority area, there is a ward called Ilkley, of which lots of people have heard because of the Yorkshire anthem. It is the 35th richest ward in the country, whereas 12 of our wards are in the bottom 10 per cent. A few years ago, Ilkley decided that it did not want to be associated with Bradford and that it wanted to move to the North Yorkshire authority, but that campaign stopped dead when Ilkley found out that the subsidy on the lines from Ilkley to Leeds and to Bradford exceeded the council tax income of the whole town. We pour money into the 35th richest ward in the country for commuting, while we leave inner-city communities desperate and desolate. Inequality, whether for reasons of race, income or whatever is a non-starter. We will never achieve anything with social cohesion until we seriously address those inequalities.

4.8 pm

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): First, I must declare an interest, as I do in all these debates, as my wife, who works for Devon county council, is currently seconded to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. She is thoroughly enjoying her work.

It has been an excellent debate. I think that it has been excellent because we have an excellent and challenging report to work from. We have heard a lot about housing. The Minister for Housing and Planning is present, and he will probably say in his defence that the new draft Housing Bill will change the quality of accommodation. It certainly contains good measures, which we have debated at length in the pre-legislative scrutiny committee, but the housing issue will not be resolved unless we start to build more homes. Until the Government tackle that programme and come up with proposals to build properties, whether in inner cities or rural areas, the tensions will not be relieved. They will persist until we have enough homes of good quality, because newly arrived communities—usually those from ethnic minorities—and the poorer people will always end up in the homes that are not fit for habitation. Sadly, the Government have failed to tackle that issue so far. Perhaps in his response the Minister for Housing and Planning will enlighten us on how we are to have more homes that are fit for habitation.

The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) sounded half apologetic for speaking in the debate—unnecessarily, because he made some good points. Like him, I represent a south-west constituency and, probably like him, I was contacted by my local papers after Trevor Phillips made his comments a couple of weeks ago. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman recalls that some years ago The Observer published a document about racial hatred and racial abuse in the United Kingdom. What surprised most people was the fact that if one is from an ethnic minority, one is more likely to be racially abused in the south-west than in London. There are a number of reasons for that. Partly, it is because many people are racists, and in our areas there are fewer people for them to abuse, so each person's chances of being targeted are higher. It is a problem.

In addition, there is a tendency among councillors of all parties to believe that racism is an inner-city problem. They have seen what has happened in Bradford and Oldham and elsewhere and they think, "That is their problem, not ours. We are glad that we live here; we do not have such problems." However, we do. Some excellent work has been done in Devon and Cornwall by a former Labour councillor, John Anthony—I hate to tell the Minister, but he has left Labour; it is not that he is no longer a councillor—who works on racial equality. Excellent work is being done in building links between communities in Exeter and in south Devon, so that we do not suffer problems in the future when we try to integrate people.

To give an idea of the problems that we encounter in rural areas, let me tell hon. Members that when I first contested Teignbridge in 1992, I was out canvassing Widecombe—the place, not the right hon. Lady of a similar name—and came to a typical small cottage. The lady who came to the door was stereotypical of a Devon character. She was fairly short and fairly round, with rosy cheeks; she had on a pinny and she stood on a flagstone floor. My previous campaign had been fought in Chislehurst, where I had regularly come across National Front members in the outlying areas close to Lewisham. The first thing that that lady said to me was, "It's all the fault of the foreigners." Usually, when somebody starts like that I, like most politicians I suspect, back track as fast as possible and move on because there is no point in having the argument.

However, it was the end of the day and I was slightly tired, so I spoke to her for a little longer. I had not seen any people from ethnic minorities in Widecombe; there were none there in those days, and it turned out that her complaint about the village being destroyed by foreigners referred to the fact that people had moved in from Newton Abbot, about six miles down the road. If somebody who is just from a different place is seen as an outsider—a "foreigner"—how much more difficult will it be for somebody who is demonstrably different, whether gay or with a slightly different skin colour, to settle into such a community?

I do not criticise those communities, they are wonderful places where if something goes wrong—one's house floods, for example—the neighbours will work hard together to help. They are very supportive. However, what comes with that is that they can also be frightening or intimidating to outsiders. That is why it is important for councils in rural areas to recognise that the recommendations and points made in the Select Committee report apply to them and not just to inner-city areas.

I hope that the report is part of an ongoing process and not just a one-off. If we are to tackle social cohesion, we must have an understanding of the matrix of society. We must also be in touch with the zeitgeist—that is a terrible word and I hate it; I should say with the spirit of the time. We must have a clear understanding of structures and interrelationships, and of how people feel.

Parts of the report recommend that more research should be done, and it is important that the Government act on that. Without going through all the recommendations one by one, I hope that the Minister will say, "Yes, there is good reason to do that."

I have to confess to slight disappointment by this debate. It is wonderful that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister: Housing, Planning and Local Government Committee undertook the report, but it is a cross-cutting matter and it is a shame that Ministers from other Departments did not have the opportunity to hear this debate. We have concentrated on housing, but we have touched on education and health, and it is important that those Ministers implement the report. Paragraph 13 states:

> "Social cohesion should be seen as a long term issue to be considered by all agencies."

That is entirely right and very important. To effect that, the Government will have to work harder in their cross-cutting Departments. What seems to happen at the moment is that the cross-cutting teams try to impose the central will and the Departments try to resist it. Somehow, the Government must resolve the blockage between the different civil service Departments in cross-cutting areas. Unless we have joined-up government—all Governments have tried to achieve that and have always had difficulty in doing so, so the problem is not new—we will not get to the bottom of the matter in time.

I want to make a couple of points about recommendations 4 and 5. Recommendation 4 states:

> "Local authorities and other public agencies need to develop a vision for the provision of services which ensures that they serve different communities . . . Any decision on the funding of a new initiative and the location of a new public facility needs to be tested to ensure that it will promote social cohesion and avoid segregation."

Recommendation 5 states:

> "All funding applications for new . . . facilities such as schools, hospitals, leisure/community centres, etc, should be closely scrutinised from a social cohesion standpoint."

That is entirely right and, again, I hope that the Minister accepts that. However, the implication—the Minister may comment on this—is that if a school is built in a location that covers the catchment area of different communities, whether those communities are ethnic, on a white council estate or in posh suburbs, that might not be the cheapest or most convenient location in which to construct it. The funding formula that follow projects must be able to take account of additional costs that may accrue by enacting that recommendation.

I was a member of the Standing Committee on the Fire and Rescue Services Bill, and I notice that the report contains a couple of good examples of where the fire services are working with the community. Page 18, on the case study of Oldham community fire station, says:

> "Initially the brigade funded a single uniformed community cohesion outreach worker to develop a network of contacts within other organisations working in the various communities."

A few pages later, paragraph 75 says, on youth provision:

> "Other public agencies including the fire and police services have also become involved in promoting social cohesion among young people . . . 'Fire service personnel have also been recognised as possessing unique qualities, which they can bring to the process, by virtue of service provision to all, regardless of colour, religion, age or social classification.'"

When we considered the Fire and Rescue Services Bill, we were approached by the chief fire officers with a request that the new combined fire authorities should have the general power of well being. We pressed that as an amendment to the Bill, and it was rejected. There is a danger in the Fire and Rescue Services Act 2004 that fire service chiefs do not believe that they can undertake that work because it is outside their remit. It is very important that the Government make it clear to the fire services that they can undertake such work, because they are in some ways in a unique position to help social cohesion and resolve problems in that regard.

On education, the report highlights a dilemma and a problem in current Government policy on faith schools. The Government have been on the record as saying that they want to see more faith schools. There are Members of different persuasions who have different views on that, and there is a body of opinion on education that says that there should be no faith schools and that schools should all be the same, although that is not my personal standpoint. There are some good examples cited in the report, and it highlights a couple of important issues. Recommendation 17, on paragraph 58, says:

> "The Department for Education and Skills should commission a survey into the relative performance of multi-cultural schools aimed at dispelling any concerns that they perform any less well than mono-cultural or single faith schools."

I am not too sure whether, if the Department does that research, that will necessarily be shown in all cases. There are unique reasons why single-faith schools can be high achieving, although I am aware of a single-faith school in my constituency that had a very bad Ofsted report a few years ago.

The report goes on to say that of the single-faith schools,

> "few tended to promote social cohesion unless there were determined policies to promote integration through the curriculum."

That is the absolute nub of the matter. If we are to have single-faith schools, it is important that they work to integrate and bring about social cohesion. It is absolutely vital that they are part of the community; they cannot just separate themselves off as if the community does not exist. In my constituency, there are good examples of Catholic schools that have a large intake of non-Catholic pupils, and vice versa, which is the division that tends to be found there. My mother is a Catholic, and I remember when I was young the prejudice against Catholics that the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) spoke of earlier. Such prejudice is relieved only by having people of different faiths, different communities, different races and different ethnic backgrounds learning together and playing together. I hope that the Minister has not prepared his entire response in advance and that he can enlighten us on the Government's thinking on faith schools.

Finally, on asylum and the National Asylum Support Service, Committee recommendation 46 states that

> "any review of asylum policy by the Home Office should incorporate an examination of those cases where the current dispersal policy is alleged to have damaged local communities."

The Committee did not go far enough on that point.

A private care home in Teignmouth, named Dun Esk, used to house elderly people, but because the care in the community policy did not provide sufficient elderly people to send there, the owners decided to turn it into a place for asylum seekers. At the time, it was a controversial move. However, once under way it was successful. Having overcome the reaction of the local bigots, the faith communities worked together to provide education and support. They also needed to provide clothing, because the allowances were never adequate for people who arrived in nothing but what they stood up in. However, under the Government's and NASS's policy, it was decided that the home was in the wrong place, and they stopped sending people there. As a result, the home eventually went bust and had to close.

The Government need to reconsider their asylum distribution policy. They need to consider whether the places where people want to set up homes have the support of the communities. If they do, such people should be encouraged; we should not be hidebound by regulation. We should not use the regulations to say that someone is doing a good job but in the wrong place, and that they can no longer continue. That is nonsense. My one criticism of the report is that it needs to go further on that subject.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): Social cohesion is vital, and it is the subject of a lengthy report and an interesting debate. Given that the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross) declared his wife's interest in Devon and the Deputy Prime Minister, I should draw attention to my own entry in the Register of Members' Interests. My wife also works very hard—not least, and disproportionately so, in taking care of my two beautiful little boys.

Social cohesion depends on what unites people. In the opening speech from the Chairman of the Select Committee, we heard that it can depend on what people share. At the apex, perhaps, is the sense of a common identity, which springs from the idea and reality of community. Communities are not accidents. They are not the artifice of Ministers, not even one as diligent as the Minister for Housing and Planning. They are natural things that spring from the sense that people have of the things that unite them.

I suggest that communities are built on three pillars. First, they are constructed on the collective consciousness of the people who reside and work in particular places—a manner, mood and local culture inspired and informed by the collective wisdom of ages, transmitted from one generation to another. They are embodied in local institutions, customs, language and folklore.

Secondly, communities are the result of the familiar touchstones of enduring certainty. They are about aesthetic experience, the built environment and landscape, but also about communal facilities. They are about shops, recreational opportunities, parks and libraries, local doctors, schools and newspapers—we have heard how important they can be—and about pubs and clubs and all those other things that people enjoy in their locality. Communities are also about institutions—churches, local councils and the host of little platoons of community groups, charities and voluntary organisations, each with its own intricacies, civilities and courtesies, which collectively the building blocks of civilised life.

Thirdly, community is about the ability of settlements to adapt to change and to assimilate incoming residents. Community is about the social mobility that springs from that acceptance of newcomers. Robust and confident communities appreciate the opportunity presented by blending long-established and new populations, but change should, ideally, be incremental. The built environment is as good an example of that as any. All that we build should add to what is there. It should be in scale and in character with the established settlement. It should be appropriate and should often be vernacular. It should always be determined by the people of the community.

Sadly, the modern history of our towns and cities is one of the growth of soulless, ubiquitous townscapes incapable of generating the shared pride and communal investment on which cohesion is built. I am sad to say that journies to towns across Britain will reinforce that impression—that reality, for many of us.

The report illustrates the fact that Government and local government have an important part to play in reinvigorating our towns and cities and in rebuilding social cohesion where it has been lost. That is about what the Government do and do not do. My greatest criticism of this Administration is that it is always there when we do not need it, with another petty regulation and another tax rise, but never there when we do, when a community needs support or when we need to see a local policeman.

Ms Buck indicated dissent.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Lady may say that that is ridiculous, but it is pretty hard to find a policeman in many of the villages in my constituency. They are a rarity. The local police do a fine job, but their resources are overstretched. For that reason, the relationship between the law and the people is in jeopardy, because people's fear of crime becomes exaggerated, and the response to crime, when it occurs, becomes ever more uncertain. It is therefore important to say that people should have a reasonable expectation of those sorts of public services, but people in many of our communities are becoming more and more disappointed about their delivery.

Ms Buck: There is a lot of common ground between us, but if he is to be absolutely fair, the hon. Gentleman must concede that the delivery and scale of public services—whether we are talking about crime and policing, education, or many other services delivered by local government—and the investment in communities to which he referred are evidently greater than they were several years ago.

Mr. Hayes: We could have a wide-ranging debate on that subject alone, but with your perspicacity and diligence, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you would quickly call me to order. Let us explore it for a moment, however, with your indulgence.

It is undeniably true that investment in a whole range of services has improved. It is, however, more questionable whether, in the experience of many of our countrymen, outputs reflects that greater investment. I draw the hon. Lady's attention to comments made by the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), who always speaks with insight and charm in these debates. People in rural areas are probably rather less happy about—

Ms Buck indicated dissent.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Lady shakes her head, but people in rural areas are probably less happy about, for example, response times from the necessary services. It is very hard to deliver effective public services in a sparsely populated rural community, and I am yet to be convinced that the Government, or previous Governments, have taken sufficient account in their allocation of resources of such challenges. That might apply to various health services; it certainly applies to policing. I had a meeting with the chief constable and the chairman of my local police authority only yesterday, just a few yards from this place, about exactly those challenges, and they expressed the most profound concerns about the resources that they have to deliver high-quality public services in the very rural county of Lincolnshire.

Ms Buck: I am conscious of the wise words of my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) that we must be careful not to draw too rigid a distinction between urban and rural communities. However, let us take an example that has been dear to the hearts of rural and urban communities: post offices. There is a danger of a mythology building up that rural communities are harder done by, because it is an inevitable geographical fact that rural dwellers have to go greater distances to get to services. However, London has had a significantly greater share of post office closures than anywhere else in the country. If we investigated a number of public services, we would find that, despite the sparsity debate, it is urban areas that have greater deprivation, greater need and a lower level of service in comparison with that need.

Mr. Hayes: I take the hon. Lady's point about post offices. She is right that urban post office closures have been a real concern across the country. I suppose that the response to her point was embedded in the point itself when she said that access to facilities in rural areas is often more difficult simply because of where people live and the sparsity of services. That is exacerbated for the most vulnerable citizens. Half of rural parishes do not have a bus services. Many villages in my constituency do not have one. People are particularly disadvantaged if they do not own a car, or cannot share one or get a lift, and if their village has no shop—as a number of my villages do not—no church and none of the facilities that I have described as being some of the vital components in building community life and delivering social cohesion.

I am not saying, however, that this is a simple matter. The picture is much more complex than that. I am simply reinforcing what the hon. Member for Stroud said: some of the problems faced by rural areas are as profound, in those terms, as urban problems are. The problems may differ in detail, but they are certainly not different in degree. I know that the hon. Lady, with her usual generosity, will be willing to accept the measured compromise that I have expressed in those few words. [Interruption.] I think that we can take that as an acclamation.

In addition, the Government need to be careful about their current preoccupation with choice, freedom and opportunity, which seems to permeate every speech and announcement that we hear from them these days. I know that the Minister is at the centre of Government and is new Labour personified, and I think that he needs to be careful about that, too. There are real issues about the balance between those important things and things such as entitlement, security and certainty, which are also important elements in delivering individual fulfilment but also collective contentment and social cohesion. I simply warn the Minister—he may say that he does not need warning—that there will be difficult decisions to make about choice. I say no more than that. He will probably be able to elaborate on that in his no doubt thorough winding-up speech.

What rings true from the report and the response to it is that the Government can be an important facilitator of cohesion in bringing together disparate groups within a community. I think in particular of the voluntary sector and private sector. Often what people do is duplicated and there is an apparent barrier to sharing information and good practice. The Government can be helpful in that respect in a variety of ways.

Housing was mentioned a number of times in the debate, including by the hon. Members for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) and for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King). I do not want to be too complimentary about them, because last time I was nice to one of the hon. Ladies—I cannot remember which one—I was accused in the press of flirting, and I have never understood quite what that meant.

Both hon. Ladies identified housing as an important aspect of delivering social cohesion. If social mobility and the mitigation of disadvantage are important elements in delivering social cohesion, housing must lie at the centre of our considerations. The acquisition of housing, both to rent and to own, is an important element in giving people a feeling that they have a stake in their community. The issue is not solely about home ownership, although it is partly so. We know that between 85 and 90 per cent. of people want to own their own homes, and it is important that we provide as many of them as possible with the opportunity to do so.

Ownership lies close to the centre of the issue, but we must also deal with the unacceptably significant problem of homelessness. I know that the fact that we have now reached the dreadful figure of 100,000 people in temporary accommodation weighs on the Minister's conscience every night when he goes to bed. That figure really is not appropriate, and I am sure that he will want to do something about it. However, it is vitally important that we address the issues associated with homelessness and hidden homelessness—I draw attention to Crisis's good work and report on that subject—as a means of delivering a greater sense of shared identity and a greater feeling among people that have a real stake in their communities.

I make no bones about the fact that I would like the Minister to consider shared equity as a way of dealing with affordability. I would like him to create a more flexible and fluid housing market so that people can move more easily from social housing into market housing, thus freeing social housing for the homeless. I would like the Minister to be more innovative and imaginative in his approach to housing. I know that being in government is tougher than being in opposition, but it is time for fresh thinking about those issues and that has a direct bearing on the consideration of the report and its aftermath.

We also heard about diversity—I mention the hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Bow again because she summed up the issues clearly. She said that as diversity had grown, simultaneously, cohesion had often reduced. That is an interesting observation, and we must be bold in addressing it. The real question is whether those trends are coincidental or whether one is the consequence of the other. If they are consequential, how do we overcome the challenge?

I do not have any great solutions, but I suspect that the right way forward involves trying to emphasise the things that unite us, so that they become more significant in our considerations, than the things that divide us. There are a lot of ways we could do that—for instance, through education, by building good links between communities, through aspiration and housing, as I have said, or through employment practice. The process must not be top-down, however, but bottom-up, with the Government acting as a stimulator and facilitator.

It is probably true that in communities that have experienced problems for a long time, in the way that the hon. Lady described, some of the lessons—I put it no more strongly than that—are better understood and have been learnt more effectively. It is interesting to compare, as she did, the experience of east London and its long history of assimilating new groups with the history of Oldham, which is highlighted in the report and which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Bennett), who is the Chairman of the Select Committee. Perhaps we need to be better at exporting good practice and sharing across institutions some of the knowledge and understanding that has been gleaned in communities where things work as well as they can. I am not sure that the mechanisms for that are well developed. I often think that cross-authority, cross-organisation work of that kind is not as well founded as it might be, not even the sharing of good practice across local authorities, let alone across health, education and social services, the voluntary sector, the private sector and local authorities, in different geographical areas.

Ms King: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. I just want to underline the fact that various other local authorities are using the practice developed in Tower Hamlets, but he is right that we need to improve and extend best practice.

Mr. Hayes: I take the hon. Lady's point, which does not require further comment.

I was in Wandsworth last week to look at that excellent borough's work on hidden homes. I know that the Minister is familiar with it. That outstanding project has made available many new social flats and houses for homeless people. I went into some of them, and they were absolutely superb properties that, frankly, anyone would be happy to live in; I certainly would. I ask the Minister to consider whether that example could be exported. Wandsworth estimates that there may be as many as 10,000 properties across London. I cannot validate the number, but the programme is certainly worth considering. It is another example of the kind of shared practice to which the hon. Lady draws attention.

I expect that the Minister will want give us a long and detailed summary, so I shall just review some of the specific points made in the report. I note the comments about youth provision, which are timely, given that the Prime Minister did not seem to know what the youth service was during Prime Minister's questions. He was asked a question by my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) about the youth service but did not seem to understand what it was, which is slightly worrying.

The youth service is important. Youth provision is heavily associated with the objectives of social cohesion, which, as the hon. Members for Denton and Reddish and for Bethnal Green and Bow, and others, said, must intrinsically transcend all the agencies of the Government and local government. As has been said repeatedly, it must be not a bolt-on but an intrinsic consideration in the formation and delivery of a range of public policies. Recommendation 25 deals with the youth service.

In recommendation 30, the Select Committee draws attention to the importance of social cohesion in major strategic Government initiatives, and it mentions the Northern Way. I spoke on social cohesion at the Northern Way conference in Leeds recently. It seems slightly remiss that it is not at the heart of that initiative, although it is mentioned, and that it does not play a large part in the sustainable communities plan, which seems peculiar. The point was identified by the Committee, and I hope that the Minister will address it.

Several recommendations—42, 43, 44 and 45—deal with policing. I do not wish to go into great detail, except to say that under successive Governments there has been a kind of policing that is, in essence, target and crime-driven. That did not begin in 1997, of course—the assumption is more deep-rooted than that. However, the result of that has been that non-adversarial policing has become harder, because of the resource implications.

Essentially, crime-driven targets, which lead to the areas with the greatest crime getting the most resources, perhaps, understandably, mean that all the work done by the police in reassuring people, going to schools and working with all the agencies that comprise communities is hard to justify against national objectives and targets, and hard to fund because of the way resources are allocated. They do that work, but it is increasingly difficult for them. We need to take a close look at how the police are funded and how we can improve their opportunity to become involved in what might be called non-adversarial police work.

Andrew Bennett: I hope that perhaps the hon. Gentleman will take a little time to consider what has been happening in Oldham. As I understand matters, one thing that Chief Superintendent Baines did was to try to make sure that the police did much more of the kind of work he has described, including reassuring communities. Some of the spin-off was that the police got far more information back from the community. As a result, they achieved their targets for reducing crime.

Mr. Hayes: That is exactly that point. When the police become involved in that kind of preventive policing, they do not simply reassure the community and deal with the fear of crime. They also develop an effective intelligence-gathering operation, which helps to prevent future crimes. In addition, they take on an educational role, particularly for young adults and children, which helps to change the culture connected with lawlessness.

The trouble with those approaches is that some are hard to measure. They have an effect but it is not immediate—there is no direct cause and effect. We need to examine the ways in which the Oldham experience, and that of other towns and cities that have gone about the same task, can become a regular part of policing assumptions. Police authorities still do not universally adopt that kind of proactive and imaginative strategy.

Ms Buck: I agree wholeheartedly with what the hon. Gentleman says, but can he assure me that in future he and his colleagues will not pore over newly published crime statistics for any that are moving in the wrong direction and then use them as a stick to beat current policing practice?

Mr. Hayes: I could not possibly make a commitment on behalf of my colleagues in the shadow Home Affairs team, because they are wiser and better informed than I could ever be. I will say that we need a measured approach to criminal statistics. They can often be interpreted in many ways. Indeed, that is probably true of most Government statistics.

I want to raise another issue before I finish. It is almost the dream that dare not speak its name, and it certainly has not spoken its name in the debate. I mean the dream of assimilation. We have heard a lot about diversity, which is important. It is good that we have heard a lot about it. However, at some stage—today is not the day, because there is not time and a thorough and considered debate is needed—the House should talk about the issue that Trevor Phillips put on the agenda as effectively as anyone could have done a few months ago. That is the issue of whether we want an assimilated society—one that he described as placing greater emphasis on cohesion than seems to happen now.

I mention that because it is an important debate that is needed. I draw no conclusions and am not making bold statements today, but the House needs to talk about it much more openly and honestly than we have done so far, because it has great ramifications.

For me, the greatest purpose of politics is the mitigation of disadvantage. The issue of poverty has been raised. I do not think that social cohesion is possible while there is extreme poverty. I do not think that social cohesion is possible unless there is a real sense of social mobility. I think that that must be acknowledged.

The hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) speaks too rarely. We should hear more of him. I think that the Minister has been a little unkind in not letting his able assistant give forth to the House more regularly. I think that the real reason is that the Minister thinks that he might be put in the shade.

Mr. Rooney: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not flirting with me.

Mr. Hayes: I do not know what that means. I am not even off base camp when it comes to flirting.

As I said, for me the greatest purpose of politics is the mitigation of disadvantage. The greatest challenge in assisting human happiness is to repair where there is damage and sometimes to recreate social cohesion through social renewal. That means family. It means community. It means strong values and shared pride. All those things are necessary if we are to have true social cohesion.

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Keith Hill): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Bennett) on securing the debate and on bringing the important subject of community cohesion to the attention of the House. I am pleased to respond to the debate, not only, properly, as a Minister in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister but as a Member of Parliament who represents an extremely diverse constituency in south London. The 2001 census showed that almost 40 per cent. of the residents in my constituency are from a black or minority ethnic background.

It has, generally, been a good debate, wide ranging and well informed. I am sure that the House will forgive me if I single out the excellent contribution by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney). It was a superb vindication my choice of him of Parliamentary Private Secretary.

Many important issues have been raised, and I will seek to address them. Where I am unable to respond to a specific issue, I will write to the hon. Member concerned. It goes without saying that Ministers in other Departments will follow our proceedings carefully.

[Keith Hill]

I pay tribute to the Select Committee and its Chairman for the thorough and thoughtful way in which they approached the inquiry and explored a number of issues important for the future of our society. The Committee's report is a constructive contribution to the debate and makes a number of interesting recommendations on which I shall continue to reflect. Following the disturbances in Oldham, Bradford and Burnley in the summer of 2001, social cohesion became a key priority on the Government's agenda. I welcome the opportunity to emphasise its importance.

For the sake of clarity, I want to use the Government's preferred term, which is "community cohesion", rather than "social cohesion". We believe that it recognises that people lead local lives and that local communities must play an extremely important part in finding solutions to local problems. None of us can be complacent about community cohesion. Cohesive communities are strong and safe communities and are able to address issues affecting the social and economic well-being of all their residents.

Since 2001, we have taken numerous measures to tackle the causes of the disturbances, and we welcome the Committee's recognition of the progress that we have made. We worked in partnership with colleagues from across Government, the wider public service, the private sector and voluntary and community organisations to develop a good understanding of how to create the context in which cohesion can grow.

Since the disturbances, Bradford, Burnley and Oldham have all received significant additional funding and a range of other support from central Government and the regional government offices. All three areas have put in place robust community cohesion plans, developed by local agencies working together. We are encouraged by the commitment that they have shown. I visited the Bradford home hunter scheme, which has seen a sevenfold increase in the number of black and minority ethnic households on the housing register and a 68 per cent. increase in lettings to that group. The scheme was devised after research highlighted a lack of knowledge among people from black and minority ethnic groups about how to access social housing and negative perceptions about council housing. An action plan was drawn up that focused on, for example, reforming the allocations system by adopting a choice-based lettings scheme; improving direct communication between social landlords and black and minority ethnic communities; improving the condition and image of council estates; combating racial harassment; and promoting cross-cultural awareness.

The House will be aware that both Oldham and Burnley are benefiting from the housing market renewal pathfinders, which provide £53.5 million to the Oldham-Rochdale partnership and £68 million to east Lancashire. Cohesion has been emphasised in both partnerships. In response to a precise point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King), a good example of how pathfinder money has been used to promote cohesion is the extension of a council arm's length management organisation called First Choice Homes, which provides support to people moving into homes in areas not traditionally associated with their own community. Tenants are provided with a package of support that includes an out-of-hours call service to housing officers and the police if they suffer any racially motivated incidents; visits by housing officers in the initial stages of their tenancy; and security measures. It is an interesting and important project. If it is an approach that proves successful, we will encourage its roll-out nationally.

Since the Government published their response to the Select Committee in July, work has continued across government to take forward this important agenda. Notably, the first part of updated Local Government Association guidance on cohesion will be published next week at a community cohesion pathfinder event. That practical guidance will be followed by strategic guidance early next year.

Andrew Bennett: Will my right hon. Friend assure me that it will be much more effective than the existing guidance?

Keith Hill: It will be, as a result of the importance that my right hon. Friend's Committee has attached to proposals of that sort. In light of the disturbances of 2001, debates such as this and his Select Committee's report, which have seized the agenda, I can assure him that the Government are already responding in a positive and practical way to many of the issues he has identified. I can also assure him that, with an expectation of early delivery, much work is continuing within government.

I was pleased to launch a joint Home Office and ODPM guidance document for those working and living in area-based initiatives last week. With reference to those initiatives, my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North said that the guidance document was particularly pleasing as it provides helpful, practical guidance and real-life case studies for those making ABIs work on the ground. The Committee recommended that local authorities and local agencies should agree concordats with local media, setting out how they would work together. I assure my hon. Friend that those concordats will be launched soon. The launch will be deliberately low profile, so that it does not have a counter-productive impact.

As a Leicester lad, born and bred, I was interested and pleased to hear my hon. Friend's observations about the attitude of the Leicester Mercury and its editor, Mr. Nick Carter. My hon. Friend's account of its approach is very reassuring, all the more so because historically it was not always thus—far from it. I congratulate the Leicester Mercury and its editor.

My Department said that it would carry out a race impact assessment of the housing allocations legislation, and that work is being taken forward. We have also commissioned long-term research into the impacts of choice-based lettings to which we committed ourselves in our response to the Committee's report.

Further progress has also been made on the Government's community cohesion and race equality strategy, which will be launched later this year. We acknowledge that there is still much work to be done but we are determined to build on the progress that we have already made—for example through the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000. That is why we have decided that this is an appropriate time to develop a Government-wide community cohesion and race equality strategy, which is due to be launched at the end of the year. That will form the basis of a renewed programme of action across Government and more widely to build community cohesion and reduce race inequalities.

The strategy will emphasise that although there is a key role for all central Departments in promoting community cohesion, it is organisations at local and regional levels that will be the key drivers of change. We need strong local leadership from all sections of the community, and we recognise the need to incentivise local authorities to break down barriers between different communities. That is why we have taken various measures, such as revising the comprehensive performance assessment framework from 2005 to assess a council's approach to promoting community cohesion as part of the safer and stronger communities judgment in the corporate assessment.

Mr. Hayes: What specific steps have the Government taken to encourage the communication of good practice between authorities and the sharing of information between other agencies? That is fundamentally important, as various hon. Members have said.

Keith Hill: The hon. Gentleman will recall my reference to the fact that only last week, I launched a good practice guide on the basis of the experience in community cohesion contained in area-based initiatives. That kind of guidance, and the drawing together of good practice, will be part and parcel of all Government initiatives in this field. It is fundamental that we draw on what has succeeded so that it can be as widely communicated as possible.

On the CPA process, although we do not propose to weight cohesion in the way that we weight some of the major service areas, we expect that cohesion will be a consideration in any judgment on each service area, where it has been identified as a weakness. For local authorities where cohesion is identified as a problem, we expect to see improvement plans in place throughout all service areas. In other words, we want to encourage what might be termed a golden thread of cohesion running through all improvement planning.

Indeed, we strongly believe that community cohesion principles need to be embedded in all mainstream services and that that is not just about special projects. As I have already mentioned, we have revised the CPA framework from next year to assess a council's approach to promoting community cohesion. At local level, various authorities including Calderdale and Blackburn with Darwen have cohesion targets in their local public service agreements. Oldham has a target on fairness in employment and service delivery and a second target on building cross-cultural links between schools.

In particular, my Department has been working to incorporate community cohesion in mainstream policies in the fire service, which was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish and the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross). We have encouraged the fire service to play an increasing role in that agenda, including through local strategic partnerships and in partnership with neighbourhood wardens. Firefighters have been working with young people through a range of schemes, and community fire stations have made their facilities available for community use. Beacon status with funding was awarded to Cheshire fire authority in recognition of its wide-ranging work to promote community cohesion.

Furthermore, we have worked with the Local Government Association, the Home Office, the Audit Commission, the Commission for Racial Equality and the Inter-Faith Network to revise the LGA guidance on community cohesion—another example of the ways in which we are trying to spread good practice. That was raised by the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes). The first of two documents will be published in November, and it sets out practical steps that local authorities and their partner organisations can take to build community cohesion into their policies and delivery of services, as well as providing examples of good practice. The second publication will provide strategic guidance to local authorities and their partners and will be published early next year.

We all recognise that central and local government and all our partners have more to do in order to build community cohesion. That means finding new ways to work together so that we can deliver even more efficient and effective public services. Local area agreements represent a radical new approach to improving co-ordination between central Government and local authorities and their partners, working through the local strategic partnership. Bradford will be one of the 21 pilot local authorities. That is a positive development, because local area agreements will simplify the number of additional funding streams from central Government going into an area, help to join up public services more effectively and allow greater flexibility for local solutions to particular local circumstances.

Community cohesion is a cross-cutting issue that concerns several central Departments. It is a key priority for my Department because of our commitment to sustainable communities. The Select Committee report expressed concern that many regeneration initiatives target very local areas and have generated resentment among residents in other areas who feel that they are losing out. However, we believe that the national strategy for neighbourhood renewal places regeneration within the right framework to ensure that it does not cause such tensions. It recognises that community participation is vital in regeneration projects, in order to be able to empower local people and to explain why different choices are made. It also enables local strategic partnerships to allocate funds according to local priorities, working across neighbourhood boundaries if they consider that appropriate. The Government's aim of narrowing the gap between the most deprived areas and the rest should also reduce the potential for tensions that can cause conflict in local communities.

We strongly believe that area-based initiatives can stimulate community cohesion if adequate support is provided. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Home Office have worked together to issue guidance both for those designing area-based initiatives and for those delivering them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) raised the issue of capacity building. I absolutely take her point about the long-term need for it, but I must point out that the neighbourhood renewal fund provides funding for capacity building to community empowerment networks, which are represented on the NRF local strategic partnerships. Community engagement is central to the national strategy for neighbourhood renewal.

Andrew Bennett: Does the Minister recognise that capacity building has to go on and on? One of the sad things in many cases has been that as capacity has been built up, and people have gained skills, they have used half those skills to help the community, and the other half to move on to different communities. Therefore, we have continually to increase the supply of people with skills in each community.

Keith Hill: My hon. Friend is entirely right. That is what I acknowledged in my response to my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North. The point is very well taken, and I undertake to take it back into my work as a housing and planning Minister. The issue of housing was raised by my hon. Friends the Members for Denton and Reddish, for Regent's Park and Kensington, North, for Bradford, North and for Bethnal Green and Bow. Overcoming segregation in housing is central to building community cohesion. One of the Select Committee's key recommendations for the ODPM was to review our present policies on choice-based lettings. We do not necessarily agree with the Select Committee that there is what it calls a

However, we recognise that that is a legitimate concern, and that is one of the reasons why we have embarked on a race impact assessment of the allocations legislation, including choice-based lettings. That will be completed and published by the end of the calendar year.

We are committed to giving all social housing tenants more choice over where they live, as we believe that is the best way to build communities that are stable, viable and inclusive. Choice in housing should not be restricted only to those who can afford to rent or buy their homes privately. We are pleased that the evaluation of our pilot scheme has indicated that the introduction of choice-based letting has been widely welcomed both by applicants and the pilot authorities, and that it has led to increased participation by members of the black and ethnic minority communities.

Perhaps I may now pick up one or two points made in our debate. My hon. Friends the Members for Bethnal Green and Bow and for Bradford, North raised issues about education. There is no doubt that the long-term solution to preventing social tensions from developing in the community lies partly in the classroom. Understanding other cultures is the starting point to promoting greater tolerance, which is why we developed the citizenship curriculum. This programme of study specifically provides for pupils to be taught about the diversity, origins and implications of national, regional, religious and ethnic identities in the UK, and about the need for mutual respect and understanding.

Our education policies are all about trying to improve the quality of education provided for all children, and about giving all parents choice about their child's education. However, we acknowledge that achieving these aims alone will not necessarily achieve greater community cohesion, which is why we have developed a range of initiatives to ensure that community cohesion is a key factor in all admissions policies.

Local education authorities are required to publish an annual composite prospectus that gives details of all the maintained schools in their area, including each school's admissions policy. Many schools also use open days and taster days for prospective pupils as a means of dispelling misconceptions. Furthermore, the code of practice on schools admissions encourages faith schools to give priority over at least some places to local children of other faiths or of no faith.

My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish specifically referred to new schools. As highlighted by the Select Committee's report, the building of new schools provides an excellent opportunity for making real progress in tackling segregation. This Government have invested an unprecedented level of capital in school buildings, and we are pressing LEAs to ensure that full advantage is taken of this opportunity to provide facilities that serve all communities in an area.

In its guidance on building schools for the future, the Department for Education and Skills specifically asks LEAs to consider their plans alongside other key local strategies such as those for regeneration, and to consult the widest range of local partners and communities. Similarly, the DFES has been working to ensure that new school designs incorporate areas that will enable community activities to take place and be inviting to members of the local community.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow laid heavy emphasis on the importance of youth provision. I shall, if I may, add a personal observation, which is somewhat risky for a Minister. I totally agree with her that youth provision should rise even further on the Government's political agenda. Funding for the youth service comes from the youth and community sub-block of a local authority's education formula spend. In 2004–05, that provides possible resources of £539 million—an increase of more than 5 per cent. on last year—although I take the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish that that available spend is not always deployed. Let me add, however, that a youth Green Paper for 14 to 19-year-olds is being drafted, which is evidence that I hope will reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow that policy on young people is clearly a priority throughout Government.

I have already talked about housing but, with the indulgence of the Chamber, let me pick up on a couple of other issues in the limited time available. We are committed to mainstreaming community cohesion in housing policy. This issue is obviously a key concern for us. As my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish said, Ted Cantle considered segregated housing to be one of the main causes of the 2001 disturbances.

In addition to choice-based lettings, we are developing various initiatives to ensure that community cohesion is mainstreamed in housing policy. First, we have also developed the housing market renewal pathfinders to tackle low demand for housing in deprived areas. These are beginning to make excellent progress in areas of low demand and should contribute to overcoming segregation in housing by providing a larger selection of housing types.

We have also developed an action plan on lettings and cohesion. It focuses on research that is being undertaken and on pilot projects that are looking at the causes of conflict and the barriers to cohesion. The output from those work streams will inform the development of a more strategic approach to housing and community cohesion. The action plan is a starting point for that process. It brings together in one place the actions that ODPM, the Home Office and others are taking to develop the community cohesion and housing agenda.

Ante-penultimately, I turn to policing. We recognise the important role that the police can play in supporting local communities. Home Office Ministers have provided strong support for police activities in relation to communities and community cohesion. We have heard a positive account of the role of the police in Oldham and Burnley from my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish. The Home Office is working closely with the Association of Chief Police Officers to promote learning and best practice examples. The Metropolitan police's step change programme is a good example of a neighbourhood approach to policing, and the Home Office has supported its development.

Within the national policing plan for 2004–07, cohesion is supported by the key priority to provide a citizen-focused service that responds to the needs of individuals and communities and inspires confidence in the police, particularly among minority ethnic communities. My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish referred to the pilots already going forward under the national centre for policing excellence, which is currently piloting work around the police response to community cohesion. The work is being carried forward in eight areas: Leicestershire, Burnley, Bradford, Bournemouth, Ilfracombe, Tower Hamlets, Newcastle and Edinburgh. The results of the implementation and trial phase will form the basis of guidance to the police service, which will be delivered by the NCPE in autumn 2005.

Penultimately, on translation services, which my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish raised, the Government's response to the Select Committee highlighted a meeting of the cross-government working group on translation service, which is being led by the Home Office, which has been tasked by that group to devise a set of concrete proposals for sharing translation and interpreting services. We expect that work to be completed next year and the group will meet again to discuss how to take the proposals forward.

Today's debate has provided an excellent opportunity to reinforce the Government's commitment to a better future for our communities, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish for raising this important subject and permitting me to set out the Government's policies.

5.23 pm

Andrew Bennett: By leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I thank you for chairing our proceedings? I also thank my hon. Friends and Opposition Members for their participation and the Minister for answering so many of our questions. I assure him and the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross) that the Select Committee will return to the issues in due course because, if Select Committees are to be effective, they must keep nagging at the Government.

Question put and agreed to.

Council Tax Revaluation

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Phil Hope.]

9.30 am

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): Normally, when I stand up in the House I talk about pensions and pensioners. Although the subject today is council tax revaluation, it will be of particular interest to pensioners across the land who are suffering from a tax that has little or no relation to their ability to pay and has become increasingly onerous in recent years. While the subject of my debate is not the reform and replacement of the council tax, it is important to set the context. Although I will focus on the impact of council tax revaluation, my preferred solution is that we do not go through the whole palaver of spending £200 million revaluing houses, but move directly to a fair tax. That is obviously what I hope will happen.

In the unlikely event that that does not happen, it is worth reflecting on the possible alternative, which is the revaluation of council taxes. In many ways, the planned revaluation shows why the council tax is unfair. Under government policies, that will happen every 10 years, indefinitely. We will have a taste of it in a few years time. Then it will keep happening. Many of the problems that I describe in this short debate will be recurrent features of the system. My central point is that the impact of council tax revaluation will be capricious and arbitrary. It will create gainers and losers. Many of the losers will not be well placed to pay what in some cases will be substantially increased bills. I am not trying to run a scare story or saying that everyone will pay more. Revaluation will create gainers and losers.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Webb: On the subject of scare stories, I willingly give way.

Mr. Hammond: On the subject of gainers and losers, will he confirm that a local income tax would also produce gainers and losers?

Mr. Webb: It certainly would. I understand that 70 per cent of people would either be unaffected or would gain from a local income tax. The vast majority of pensioners, to return to my initial comments, would gain substantially from the change.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): There will be gainers and losers on revaluation, but does the hon. Gentleman accept that some of the gainers will be those who lost last time and some of the losers will be those who gained last time and so it is at least conceivable that the revised valuation framework will be fairer than the current system?

Mr. Webb: In a sense, my central point is that the pattern of gains and losses will be quite arbitrary. I started my research for this debate with certain assumptions about clear-cut patterns of gains and losses. The more I have looked at it, the more I have realised that in one street there will be a gain and in another there will be a loss. There will be well-off people gaining and there will be poor people losing; it will be all over the place. In my judgment, only moving to a system based on ability to pay will ensure that the gainers are those who can least afford to pay council tax and the losers are those who can most afford to do so.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): Does my hon. Friend accept that because the Government have been so dilatory in giving even a sense of direction on where they are going on council tax reform, we cannot begin to guess who the losers and gainers will be? All that we know is that there will be a lot of losers.

Mr. Webb: I certainly will not let that stop me trying. My hon. Friend is absolutely right. People do not know what sort of local tax system they will get. At the general election, both the Labour party and the Conservative party will stand on a policy of, "We do not know yet what sort of local tax system we want". Only one party will say what it does want to see happen. But, Mr. Sayeed, you would not want me to be diverted down that track. Let us focus on the revaluation.

The council tax was introduced in 1993 by the Conservatives after a previous failed local tax system. They were trying to get out of a local taxation mess. The system was based on 1991 property values. There was no initial provision for a revaluation when the council tax was introduced, but the Local Government Act 2003 provided for a rolling 10-year cycle of revaluation. The revaluation is now being prepared and is expected to be implemented in 2007. That is my understanding. What will the effect be? As they say, we do not need a crystal ball when we can read the book, and we can see what has happened in Wales—just a few miles away over the Severn bridge—where revaluation has already taken place.

The Welsh experience raises several interesting points, which might be informative for our discussion. First, when Welsh properties were revalued, the value of bands was increased too—not only did people move up bands because of general inflation but the value of bands increased. However, that increase was not uniform, and I shall return to that, because I had assumed—as I said, I came to the issue relatively fresh—that every band threshold would go up by the average increase in Welsh house prices. That is not what happened, however, and it is interesting to reflect on why it did not happen.

The Welsh have introduced a band I—or a band Dai, as I think they call it in Wales—at the top. Although it affects only a very small number of properties, it obviously makes the tax system slightly more progressive. The Welsh Assembly also considered changing the relative fraction of the band D council tax charge in each of the bands, but on reflection decided not to do so. So, the band structure remains essentially the same, although there is one extra band at the top, which affects a very small number of properties, and there are the same relativities between the bands. However, there is a differential increment in the band thresholds, which is quite a good thing, for reasons that I shall explain.

As is well known, the overall effect of the revaluation is that approximately a third of Welsh households will be placed in a higher council tax band—just 8 per cent. will be in a lower band. Of the 33 per cent. of Welsh households that will be placed in a higher band, 28 per cent.—or 28 33rds, as it were—will go up one band, 4 per cent. will go up two bands and approaching 1 per cent. will go up three or more bands, which is an incredible change in underlying liability. I shall come to some of the transitional measures in a moment, but those are the underlying changes.

Obviously, a lot depends on what happens to the band D rate. It is not obvious in itself that someone would pay more just because they moved up a band, although the chances are that they would pay substantially more. Someone who moved from band D to band E would pay an extra 22 per cent. of any given level of band D tax. Someone who moved from band D to band F, or an equivalent number of bands, as 4 per cent. of people would do, would pay 44 per cent. more council tax. That might be slightly offset by a reduced band D level, although we do not know that for sure yet. However, anyone who moved up two bands would be substantially hit, and that, of course, is before any increase in the council tax that a local authority might want to levy.

Valerie Davey (Bristol, West) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman said that he would not put out a scare story and that he would soon come to the transitional arrangements. Surely, those arrangements are crucial to the Welsh system and the system proposed by the Government, because nobody will be jumping three bands in the way that he suggests.

Mr. Webb: What is rather interesting about the transitional arrangements proposed by the Welsh Assembly is that someone could go up a whole band in a single year, which, if they moved from band D to band E, would mean a council tax increase of 22 per cent. Even if the band D rate fell by a few per cent. to offset the general drift upwards in bands, people could still face massive council tax rises in a single year. The 28 33rds, or slightly more than four fifths, of people who went into a higher band would therefore receive no benefit from transitional protection because they could go up a whole band in a single year. In other words, the vast majority of people who went up bands would have no benefit from transitional protection. Those who went up two bands would have only one year of transitional protection, because they could go up two bands in two years under the Welsh Assembly's transitional arrangements. That leaves only 0.7 per cent. of Welsh households benefiting for more than two years under the transitional arrangements. Someone whose council tax rose by 44 per cent. in two years would not take much comfort from the hon. Lady's intervention.

The impact on different sorts of household would be capricious and rather arbitrary. Those who were just inside a band after revaluation would probably gain. If an across-the-board valuation of bands was slightly more than the general increase in prices, the band D rate might go down. So, those who stayed in a band might pay less, while those who went £1 over a band might pay 20 per cent. more. A house price increase of £1 or £2 either way could result in a difference in council tax of as much as 20 per cent. Where is the logic in that? Where is the fairness? Cliff edges of that sort will become more acute as a result of revaluation. That would not happen with local income tax, which is a continuous method of taxation; marginal changes would have a marginal impact. There would be no cliff edges as there are with council tax.

The second capricious and arbitrary feature of the revaluation would be that people in the bottom band could not move down. Unless the Government subdivide the bottom band, and even if there was an across-the-board indexation, only by reducing the band D rate would those in the bottom band see any benefit from the process. People already in the top band could not go any higher—unless the Government introduced yet more bands at the top. Rather perversely, the reform would result in gains in some rather odd places—for instance, among those whose houses had stayed within a band even if the band thresholds had moved significantly—whereas some of the poorest households would gain very little. Looking at the Welsh example, the distribution impact of the changes is far from obvious.

I return to the point on damping raised by the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Valerie Davey). As I said, even under the transitional arrangements, some people will see their council tax increase by two bands in two years. That is a huge hike in liability, but with no change in people's ability to pay. In fact it could be worse than that. Someone who bought a house in 1991 while in employment, who was still living there after retirement in 2005, and therefore after the revaluation, could find that his ability to pay was substantially less, but that his council tax liability had increased dramatically. Again, the impact of the revaluation will have precious little to do with people's ability to pay.

If one looks beyond the aggregates, one can see huge variations in the impact of the tax among local authorities in Wales. In Cardiff, 64 per cent. of residents have seen their properties rise by one or more band; and 14 per cent. of that 64 per cent. have gone up two bands or more. One Cardiff householder in seven will have gone up by two bands or more over the next two years. They will see a rise of perhaps 30 per cent. or 40 per cent. in council tax for no improvement in services—and, critically, no change in their ability to pay. In Blaenau Gwent, however, only 7 per cent. of households have gone up, and 18 per cent. have gone down. The changes have different implications in different parts of Wales, with some people seeing a huge change in liability over a short period. What sort of tax is it that can swing massively from one year to another, but has no relation to the ability to pay?

David Taylor: Does the hon. Gentleman accept the basic assumption that the aggregate income from council tax will not necessarily rise, and therefore that those who move up one band—as he said, as many as a quarter of people will do so—will not necessarily be paying more council tax as a result of the revaluation? The charge per band could decline; it could go in the reverse direction.

Mr. Webb: I have already said that if the general tendency is to move into higher bands, there would be an offset if the band D rate were to come down. However, the beneficiaries will primarily be those who stay in the same band. If people who stay in the same band—the majority—are better off, somebody else will be worse off. The only people left are those whose council tax has gone up. It must be so.

I did not claim that those who moved from band D to band E would go up the full 22 per cent. I was explicit; I said that there might be some offset from the lower band D rate, but that it would not be a total offset. It cannot be a total offset, or those who stay within bands could not benefit; but they will benefit if the band D rate goes down. We do not know. For example, those who move up two bands—as have one in seven Cardiff households—could suffer an underlying 44 per cent. increase. I cannot believe that the band D reduction is going to be a fraction of that, and such people could still be 30 per cent. or 40 per cent. worse off over two years. That is capricious and unfair.

Mr. Hammond: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Webb: Perhaps I could make some progress. I will give way later if the hon. Gentleman still wants to intervene.

We have huge variations between areas; some people are facing very large losses. What does the Welsh experience tell us about what might happen in England? The Government obviously have not told us. They have not yet decided whether to have more bands, or whether the relativities—the ninths—or the thresholds are likely to change. One of the purposes of today's debate is to highlight what might happen, and to ask the Minister to give us some assurances about the Government's thinking on the issue. How does he plan to counteract some of the capricious and arbitrary effects of revaluation? I hope that he will respond in the right spirit.

In England, in principle, the same sort of phenomenon could take place. However, if there were to be a national revaluation of English house prices, there would be huge regional variations. For example, going by the Nationwide building society's house price index, house prices in greater London have trebled since 1991—there has been an increase of 205 per cent. The next fastest rising prices have been in the south-west, where they have risen by 193 per cent. Those regions are at the top of the table. As a south-west MP, I would point out that, of all regions outside greater London, the south-west is likely to be the one most affected by the changes. By contrast, in that period, prices rose by 141 per cent. in the north and 150 per cent. in the north-west.

If we were to continue with the present England-wide standard set of council tax bands, there would be a huge redistribution from the south to the north. If the Government were to say—perhaps the Minister will tell us that they will not—to southern authorities, "You have lots more people in bands E and F, so you can raise a lot more money. Therefore we, the Government, do not need to give you so much grant and, because the northern authorities have many more houses in bands A and B, the Government need to give them more money," there could be redistribution. The New Policy Institute is quoted on the Department's website as having estimated that there could be a £400 million deviation of resources from the south to the north of England if there were to be a straight revaluation. I am interested to note that it says,

"In our view, these simple points about the detailed pattern of winner and losers mean that basic revaluation—" which is what I have just described—

"is impossible to defend."

I hope that the Minister will reassure us that if he must go ahead and waste £200 million on the exercise, it will not be just a straightforward national revaluation.

Valerie Davey: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Webb: Again, I should like to make some progress. I have already given way to the hon. Lady.

It is worth reflecting a little on the New Policy Institute's detailed analysis— published on the Department's website—of how revaluation might be approached. It asks three questions: first, whether it would be right to have across-the-board revaluation; secondly, whether there should be new bands or different ratios between the bands; and thirdly, whether there should be regional variation. One of its reasons for thinking that across-the-board, England-wide standard revaluation would not be appropriate is that, on that basis, 75 per cent. of houses in the north-west but only 6 per cent. of houses in London would be in band A or B post-revaluation. That would create an extraordinarily skewed system. The paradox, it observes, is that under such a regime, band A houses in the north would not share in the gain and band G and H houses in the south would not share in the pain. It is not simply the case that, under revaluation, rich people in big houses pay lots more; there are all sorts of perverse, unexpected and undesirable outcomes. That is another reason why the revaluation is likely to be fraught with problems.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) has pointed out, the New Policy Institute says that under national uprating the council tax on a typical band C property in London would rise by 15 per cent. Why should one category be singled out for double-digit increases? The implications are perverse.

I said at the start that I intended to reflect on the issue of band A properties. If there are to be gains from the change, one would want them to be for people who live in small houses on relatively modest incomes. However, there is a danger that that will not happen. If the Government simply uprate all thresholds in line with the average increase in house prices, the average band D rate, broadly speaking, will not need to change. However, if the band D rate does not change, people at the bottom of the pile in band A will not benefit. Even if the value of their houses has risen much more slowly than anybody else's and they have fallen further behind other people, the tax that is supposedly to do with house values will not benefit them. They will benefit only if the bottom band is indexed by less than the increase in house prices. That is what has happened in Wales, and it would be a desirable change. Many of the properties in band A will be quite modest, so one would think that this group had quite a strong case for gaining.

The New Policy Institute also observes that the revaluation, which includes reconsidering bands, relativities and thresholds, provides an opportunity for radical council tax reform. Without it, any prospect of the so-called new localism or of local authorities seriously being able to raise more of their own money is simply unlikely, because the council tax would be such an unfair tax that the additional burden would not be acceptable to local people.

I have talked generally about the impact of the changes on England as a whole, but there will also be big differences between regions, as I mentioned. The New Policy Institute points out that the south-west is already particularly hard hit by the council tax. On page 11 of its document, it says:

> "At present, the ratio of council tax to income in the South West is about 10 per cent. higher than the national average across almost all bands."

The south-west is therefore suffering from high house prices relative to a fairly low-wage economy, so there is a disproportionate ratio between the two. It is already being hard hit by the council tax, and revaluation would hit it still further, because outside Greater London it has seen the fastest rise in house prices.

Something that struck me while I was doing research for this debate is that generalities are quite difficult to make, because the impact of the revaluation will be very localised. I shall give a couple of examples. The west of England—Avon no longer exists as a unitary authority, but we still need a name for the group of four local authorities—has produced a document on its housing situation, the "West of England Sub-regional Housing Study", which says:

> "The most evident feature of the housing market in the West of England has been the phenomenal rise in house prices over the last 8 years".

Again, the people whom I represent could suffer particularly badly because of that rapid rise in house prices. Focusing even more narrowly on my local authority, South Gloucestershire council's own strategy document says that the market really took off between 1999 and 2003, with prices rising 87 per cent. in only four years.

Certain parts of the country, particularly sub-regions and local authority areas, have real housing hotspots that could lose out very badly from this revaluation if it is not done properly. There is no silver bullet or complete fix for these problems; they are inherent in the unfair tax.

I fear that the impact will be even more localised than I have already described. It is very hard to work out from land registry data and websites for house prices what has been happening to house prices in a very localised postcode sector, because only a handful of properties of a particular type might be bought or sold there, and it is very hard to get reliable estimates. I rang my local estate agent and asked him what had happened to particular properties in Thornbury, a market town in my constituency. He considered what had happened to the price of three sorts of properties—former council properties, three-bedroom semi-detached properties, and larger four-bedroom properties—which has been the relevant consideration for council tax purposes in the past decade. His business did not exist in 1991, but he considered prices from 1993.

The estate agent found a huge variation. The price of ex-council properties had risen by 221 per cent., the price of three-bedroom semi-detached properties had risen by 186 per cent., and the price of four-bedroom properties had risen by 155 per cent. Even in sub-regional bands, the impact of the revaluation on different houses in the same street will be very different. Indeed, it will be arbitrary and capricious.

The estate agent pointed out an even more peculiar feature. Four-bedroom properties are now priced at about £250,000. Members will know that £250,000 marks one of those ludicrous stamp duty jumps. No one buys a house for £251,000, £252,000 or £253,000, because the stamp duty is suddenly hiked up, but the council tax revaluation for that property will be less severe because of the arbitrary impact of another dodgy, structured Government tax, which means that the impact of council tax reform on the owner of that property is different from the impact on the owner of another property. Once again, we have an extraordinary situation in which different people, who might be next-door neighbours living in different sorts of houses but who use the same local services and have the same ability to pay, will face substantially different increases in council tax.

The Government might say that they will ease the pain by putting in place transitional arrangements, to which the hon. Member for Bristol, West, who is no longer in her seat, referred. However, any further transitional arrangements, such as damping, will make what is already a complicated system even more complex.

What about council tax benefit? For those entitled to it, it could dampen down the impact of any increase in council tax, but a great deal would depend on take-up, and we know that barely 50 per cent. of owner-occupiers take up their council tax benefit entitlement. The Government have floated stories in the press about making council tax benefit entitlement automatic. Well, whoopee! If that were possible, wonderful, but why has it not been automatic for the past seven years or, indeed, for the past 15 years since it was introduced with council tax? We would all welcome greater take-up of the benefit, but we have yet to see any concrete proposals for how it might be done.

One way for it to be done is to say that the amount of council tax benefit to which someone is entitled is broadly independent of where they live and their council tax. Council tax benefit is the difference between someone's income and their needs as assessed by family composition. Council tax does not enter the calculation. Somebody on a particular income with a particular household composition might be required to pay only £5 towards their council tax, whether it is £10 or £20. There is the potential for a national assessment of council tax benefit entitlement—if we are to continue with the system—which would not need to be local authority or property specific, but would work out how much people were expected to pay towards their council tax. That would not solve the take-up problem, but it might enable the benefit to be dealt with more effectively.

The New Policy Institute suggests relaxing the capital limits. That would not deal with the take-up problem, but it would mean that more people with modest savings could be cushioned from the impact. That would be a relatively cheap way of trying to deal with the problem.

In 1991 we had what was euphemistically known as second-gear valuation, in which the valuers never got out of their cars, but just drove down a road slowly and decided the valuations. This time, however, details of people's home extensions will be used— for example whether they have added an extra bedroom. Therefore, the revaluation will be a home improvement tax. [Interruption.] The Minister says, if I can lip-read correctly, that that is absolute rubbish. If he wants to intervene and correct what I have said, I am happy to give way. If people have extended their home and thereby increased its value, they will potentially be pushed up into a new council tax band. We want people to make better use of the land that they have—as long as it is acceptable to the local planning authority—rather than use up more land in greenfield sites, so taxing people for improving their homes seems odd. I have given the Minister the opportunity to correct that if it is factually wrong, but he has declined to do so.

We have a fundamentally flawed system, the failures, inequities and arbitrary nature of which will be highlighted over the next few years by the revaluation process. There will be gainers and losers. Some of them will be unexpected people in unexpected places—it will not be correlated with ability to pay. Some people in small houses will not benefit at all, whereas some people in large houses will do well out of the change, provided that they stay within the same band. There will be all sorts of odd effects. Until we have a local tax system that reflects people's ability to pay, any revaluation will be unfair, arbitrary and capricious. This revaluation will cost £200 million to be arbitrary, unfair and capricious. I can think of better ways of spending that money.

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East) (Lab): I am pleased to have a chance to take part in this important debate, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) on securing it. In 2007, there will be a revaluation for council tax purposes based on the values of properties in 2005. Having spoken to the local valuation office in my constituency, I know that it is already preparing for that. However, I shall not speak about whether there should be more bands for council tax, or about how bands should be changed to reflect the change in property prices. I want to mention experiences from my constituency of the last valuation, and the problems that I hope can be prevented in the up-coming revaluation.

The poll tax was one of the most important pieces of legislation of the last 20 years in terms of its impact on the political scene. It arguably brought about the demise of the then Prime Minister and even led to rioting in Maidenhead. It still haunts us in the form of its hastily introduced successor—the council tax. I was a councillor when council tax was introduced and I remember the stories of estate agents sitting in their cars dictating the value of houses from the outside. Those stories became the stuff of legend, although naturally my local valuation office says that valuations were not done in that way. A number of my council colleagues at the time ran campaigns to inform people that they had an opportunity to appeal against the valuations of their houses. As a result, many successful appeals took place and people had the valuation of their homes reduced. That pleased them, as their bills were also reduced. The council did not lose out, because the council tax base was reduced, which meant that the council received a higher revenue support grant. Once the valuation of a large majority of houses in an area with similar properties had been reduced, the same councillors campaigned to have the whole area revalued, pleasing even more people. They were happy constituents—something that we politicians like.

It can be difficult to identify what value a property should have, especially when there are a number of similar properties in an area and they are close to the boundary between tax valuation bands. That is what allowed my former colleagues to have such success in their campaigns for rebanding. The problem is still with us. The valuation office tells me that there is an area in my constituency where the houses are on the border between bands C and D. They are on an estate built in the 1960s and 1970s from only eight designs. When those homes were valued, most were put in band D, but over time people have appealed and have mainly been successful. Of course, there are rumours around the estate about who has had a revaluation. There are also tales of people who have contacted the council but have not got anywhere. One story was of someone who lived in a house in band D and found out that their sister-in-law, who lived in a house of the same design elsewhere on the estate, was in band C.

After his election in June, Councillor Mark Ralph, who lived locally and had heard about this matter, started asking questions. As a result, the valuation office has started looking again at the valuations across the estate. It is estimated that between 300 and 450 houses on the estate will be reviewed and are likely to be revalued from band D to band C. For the householders, that is a good outcome: they will each receive approximately £1,100. There will be more happy constituents, but the situation is not so good for the council, as it will receive a bill for between £330,000 and £495,000—a bill that it had not expected or budgeted for. If the council has to pay the bill out of council tax, it will cost each band D council tax payer between £6 and £9. At the same time, the council tax base is not as high as had been thought, and the council has not been receiving the revenue support grant that it should have had. That is a double whammy for Reading borough council: it has to make a payment that it has not budgeted for, and it has not received the support that it should have done.

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to look into the matter and see whether there is some way in which Reading borough council can be reimbursed, just as the householders have been and are being. Despite having received up to £1,100, however, the householders have not had the use of that money for up to 11 years, and they have asked for interest. With non-domestic rates, interest is payable either way. If people withhold payment, they have to pay interest. If the council has money that it should not have—if, for example, someone has paid more than they should—the council has to pay the person interest. However, the situation is not the same for council tax; the council has no duty to pay interest. The householders applied to the council for interest payments, but it did not pay them, as it had no duty to do so.

The valuation office has now agreed that as it made the mistake, it will pay interest, but it will do so only on application. When the office makes a revaluation, it automatically informs the council and people automatically receive a rebate, but there is no system the other way. When the council has made a payment to someone, it should inform the householder that they have the right to request the payment of interest from the valuation office, or the council could inform the valuation office that it has made a payment, so that the valuation office can pay the interest.

In concluding, I ask my hon. Friend the Minister for three things. First, in the information given to valuation offices, can more thought be given to properties on the boundaries of valuation bands, to try to prevent the situation that I have described from happening again. Secondly, will he look favourably on Reading borough council when determining its grant levels in the coming months, so that the people of Reading, East do not have to pay for the mistakes of the valuation office? Will there be some recognition in allowances of the large numbers of payments that the council has had to make for the changes in valuations, and will there be recognition of the revenue support grant forgone in past years? Thirdly, will my hon. Friend consider requesting that councils and valuation offices set up some form of system automatically to pay interest outstanding, so that people do not miss out on it?

I am pleased to take part in this fascinating debate and to raise the experience of the previous revaluation. I hope that we are able to learn from it, and that no other councils experience what Reading experienced last time.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (in the Chair): Order. Before I call the next speaker, I should say that I expect to start the winding-up speeches before or by 10.30.

10.5 am

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) on securing this debate and on his critique of the revaluation that has occurred in Wales, because it has saved me a lot of time and research.

I want to raise one issue related to the devolution settlement, which may provide a lesson to be learned when the exercise is undertaken in England. The devolution settlement has become a complex animal. We were always told that it would be a process rather than an event, but we did not understand that the process would have so many incremental stages. It is difficult to follow all the bits of legislation through the maze.

I am concerned about the council tax band valuation on park homes. People who live in park homes tend to be on low and fixed incomes, and any increases in their costs, whether they are in energy bills or council tax payments, are hard on them. The Caerwnon park residents association, which I met over the weekend, told me that a survey of its residents showed that 90 per cent. of them were either old-age pensioners or disabled people living on fixed and often low incomes.

The association, due to good leadership, has been successful in appealing against the valuations under the old system, and it has been able to push all the properties into band A. That was done using the valuation of both the pitch and the park home. Since then, the association has noticed a written answer to a question from the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), which asked

> "the Deputy Prime Minister if he will review the way in which the Valuation Office Agency assesses mobile homes for council tax purposes."

The answer from the Minister for Local and Regional Government was:

> "Mobile homes are not in themselves subject to council tax, but liability may arise in respect of the land on which the mobile home stands. Most mobile homes pitches which are subject to council tax are rated at band A."—[Official Report, 20 May 2004; Vol. 421, c. 114W.]

I am not sure whether that is fully understood in England, but it is certainly not in Wales. I am still in the process of finding out whether, when the relevant powers were transferred to Wales, the Assembly took the opportunity of changing the regulations. If it did, it did no favours for people living in park home estates, who as I have said are often on limited incomes.

I am in the process of establishing whether the regulations in Wales are the same as those in England. Although I am a passionate believer in devolution, I do not believe that having different regulations for such a situation is of any benefit. It is essential that, in the English revaluations, the valuation officers have some clarity of purpose. In Wales, for instance, a number of the park homes have moved up from band A to band C, and I doubt whether that is on the basis of an increase in the valuation of the pitch. It is important that, when the English revaluation takes place, there is clarity and the valuation officers use the valuation of just the pitch rather than both the pitch and park home that sits on it. Apparently, the same regulation applies to boats and moorings. Clarity about the matter would go a long way towards helping the process in England, and I would like to hear the Minister's response.

10.10 am

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): It is a real delight to take part in this debate. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) not only on securing the debate but on a fabulous speech. He showed the danger that lies behind this exercise, which has not been well thought through. If it has been well thought through, the Government have not shared their ideas with the House. My hon. Friend did a great service to the Chamber, going through the issue in a reasonable and objective way and showing what the problems were. I hope that the Minister will make his answer in a reasonable way, too. I also hope that I and the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) will give the Minister plenty of time to answer, because the big problem is that so far the Government have not come clean on anything to do with the issue.

Ministers will say that they set up the balance of funding review. They did indeed. It sat for nearly 18 months and was published last summer. The Government's decision was to put it at arm's length, and to say that it was an interesting review and they were going to ask someone to review the review and report in December 2005.

It is interesting to read the chapter on council tax reform in the balance of funding review. It is a detailed chapter, drawing on some interesting research, which I will refer to later. The last section of the chapter says:

> "In short, much further detailed work is required on how council tax might be reformed, based on a clear vision of the direction of travel. It must now be for the Government to decide that direction of travel."

We have been waiting for that direction of travel, and have received no indications.

It is clear what the options are if the Government are going to be unwise enough to stick with council tax. As my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon said, they could add one or more extra bands at the bottom and top—or more than one band at the top, as some have speculated.

They could change the banding system to some regional approach, to try to deal with the different rises in property prices in different parts of the country, although that could be potentially arbitrary and capricious as it would involve picking one particular date, and we all know that house prices and differentials are changing all the time. The Government could go down that road, but they know the disadvantages.

They could deal with the different multipliers and the ratios between the different bands, setting the band limits in different ways. At the moment, council tax bands have a one to three relationship, while an estimate of the difference between property prices across the country gives a one to 20 relationship, on average. That shows that the bands and the multipliers that relate them to each other are a potential source for change.

There are three areas of change within the council tax system, and the Government have not told us which they favour. They have not told us which they are working on, although it is an open secret in Whitehall that the Treasury and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister have been doing huge amounts of work on the matter. However, we have received no answer and no definitive statement.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northavon said that we could consider what was happening in Wales, and he was right to do so. He showed how more than a third of households in Wales would be going up one or more bands, with 5 per cent. of households going up two or more bands, which could be problematic for a number of people. Unfortunately, the Government say that we cannot look at Wales. The Minister for Local and Regional Government told us:

> "What happened in Wales is not a precedent or an indication of what will happen in England".

There we have it: we cannot consider Wales, as it is completely different. How it is different, he did not say. Neither did he say what the Government were going to do differently. No comment on what the Welsh have done and how badly they have handled it has been forthcoming from the Government.

Once again, we do not know the direction in which the Government will take us. That shows dishonesty on the part of the Govt. We almost certainly face a general election in the next six or seven months, and the Government still have not told us what they are going to do, despite having done all this research, had a review for 18 months, seen what is happening in Wales, had the ODPM and the Treasury considering the matter in great detail and being faced with only three basic options. What are voters expected to make of that indecision and dissembling?

The Government are behaving outrageously. They cannot simply say, "Well, the Tories haven't told us their proposals." We know that the Tories are pretty bad—they messed up the system twice in one political generation, which takes some doing for any political party—but the Government cannot get away with blaming them. The Government are in power, and they should give some indication of their plans. At the moment, we have the bizarre spectacle of their preparing for the general election with no policy proposals, and saying to the electorate, "Well, we don't know. It's going to change, because we've legislated for it to change. Under the Local Government Act 2003, it must change on 1 April 2007, but we don't know how. We can't give you any indication." So, we have two "don't know" parties; two dithering parties that will not come clean with the electorate. That is outrageous, particularly when, if the Welsh experience is anything to go by, a third of taxpayers will lose out. That is one of the approaches that undermine people's faith in politics. It is very serious.

What evidence or studies have been forthcoming to show the potential effects? My hon. Friend the Member for Northavon talked about the work of the New Policy Institute, which is on the ODPM website. It is interesting that some of the comments put forward by the institute show that it was not sure what the Government were on about either. The second paper that the NPI put forward to the balance of funding review starts off by saying:

> "In formulating our response, we have become aware that we are not clear how far the BoF"— balance of funding—

> "review is trying to go."

I do not think that the Government know either; we are none the wiser.

The institute made a fair attempt at analysing the different options. It considered reforms such as adding bands at the bottom and top, changing the multipliers, and regionalisation. What is particularly interesting to me, as the Member of Parliament for a London constituency, is the likely impact of some of those potential changes—not changes that have been made but those identified in the scenarios in the appendix of the NPI study, which was commissioned by the Government.

In scenario 1A—the basic revaluation, from which my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon quoted—the average bill for those in inner London now on band C would go up by 15 per cent. In scenario 1B—the basic revaluation with lower band limits—the average bill for those in inner London on band C would go up by 19 per cent., whereas for those in band H it would go down by 4 per cent. There is a progressive change, with low and middle-income Londoners bearing the brunt.

In scenario 2A, in which there are 10-plus bands and different income proportional multipliers, lower and middle-income Londoners face a big rise, as do people in band H, but one wonders whether the Prime Minister would veto that, as he has just bought a property for £3.5 million, which is in band H. He would have to pay a massive £1,210, but he may not like to see his tax bill go up. He does not seem to be into progressivity when it comes to local government taxation. However, that is a slight diversion. My point is that in scenario 2A, low and middle-income Londoners face a massive tax rise.

In scenario 2B, there are 10-plus bands, but the multiplier is based on property prices. That scenario is still bad news for Londoners in band C, as their tax bills would go up by 18 per cent. Once again, low and middle-income Londoners would face a huge tax rise. So in all scenarios other than that with regional banding, which would be the most radical reform, low and middle-income Londoners experience double-digit rises. Even with regional banding there will be an increase. That is the evidence before us. No other studies have been done to my knowledge. Perhaps the Minister will be able to quote some, but I somehow doubt it.

Given that, what does the Minister expect us to say to people in the general election? We know the figures and he will probably say, "Well, the Liberal Democrats are scaremongering," but let us not scaremonger—let us have the facts. The Government must tell us what their policy is. They should say what they are going to do and give some figures and examples of what the changes will be. If they do not, it will not be surprising if people get scared, particularly in constituencies such as mine and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon.

The issue is serious. The Minister will no doubt want to use this debate to attack the Liberal Democrats. I am sure that he will stand up, not answer any of the questions that we have put, and instead have a go at local income tax. Of course he is entitled to do that, although when he does, I hope that he will point out that the same local government tax system is used in America, Japan, Sweden, Norway, Finland, Denmark and many other countries. I am sure that he will give the idea a fair hearing. I hope that he will admit that the system is related to ability to pay and that it is predictable and clear.

I hope, too, that the Minister will admit that we have been honest in recognising that there will be losers as well as gainers, and clear about how the system would work, rather than hiding; that we have put forward our proposals for democratic debate, and that we are prepared to defend them on the doorstep. That is the difference in this debate. We have been honest in putting forward our proposals, but the Minister is hiding; and if he is hiding, we suspect that he has something to hide.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) on securing this debate, because it is useful to focus on revaluation. As the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) said, the Government's response to the balance of funding review was to set up yet another review, which will not report until after the next general election, so the only certainty on council tax is that there will be a revaluation in 2005, which will kick in by 2007. Whatever else comes out of the balance of funding review, that is a fixed certainty with which we will have to deal.

I, too, am disappointed by the Government's response to the balance of funding review. One tries not to become too cynical in this place, but it seems extraordinarily convenient that such a difficult issue should need a further review that will just happen to take us to the other side of the general election. That will mean that the council tax, which, polling tells us, has the greatest salience of any tax with electors, will not be substantively addressed in what the Labour party presents to the electorate in its manifesto for the next general election.

We should identify the problems that will arise from the revaluation. I hope that we are doing that this morning. The hon. Member for Northavon clearly set out some of those problems and I am sure that we all accept that. Indeed, even the Government have to accept that the revaluation, in its crudest presentation, would give rise to those problems. However, I do not believe that the solution is the wholesale scrapping of council tax, which is the only property-based tax in the country, and its replacement by a local income tax.

Mr. Edward Davey: What about stamp duty?

Mr. Hammond: Well, stamp duty is a property transaction tax, whereas council tax is the only property value tax. The hon. Gentleman and his party are keen on looking at what happens in Europe and elsewhere, so they will know that almost all advanced countries have a property-based element in their overall mix of taxation.

The problem with council tax is that it is being used for a purpose for which it was not designed. It is meant to contribute to the cost of local services, but since 1997, the average band D council tax has increased by 70 per cent. and now stands at more than £1,100. Council tax has become part of Labour's overall stealth tax initiative, with part of the burden of taxation being transferred from identifiable, nationally collected taxes to local taxes, behind which the Chancellor of the Exchequer can shelter, at one remove from accountability. That, and the stealth redistribution of the burden of taxation, is what causes the public anxiety about the council tax. Changes to the local government grant formula have redistributed grant generally from the south to the north—it is not a clear and simple pattern—with a corresponding increase in the amount of council tax that people pay from the north to the south.

The Government were explicit when they introduced the change to the formula; the Minister of State said clearly that he wanted council tax payers to contribute a greater share of the burden of funding local services in areas where, in his definition, they could afford to do so. In other words, he was explicit that he wanted to shift the burden of taxation towards local taxpayers in certain areas.

So changes to the grant distribution system have shifted the burden geographically, creating winners and losers, as the hon. Member for Northavon said. The revaluation will further reinforce that if the problem is not tackled with an additional mechanism because of the way in which the resources equalisation mechanism works. As an area acquires a higher tax base through shifting properties into higher bands, so the amount of grant that it receives from central Government will reduce and the council tax payable by local people will correspondingly increase.

That will lead to the unacceptable spectre of relatively less well-off people in areas where property values are high—people whose only crime is to have lived for a long time, perhaps 10, 20 or 30 years, in a house that they could not even dream of buying today—cross-subsidising people who are much better off in areas that happen to have experienced much lower house price inflation, or suffered or benefited from it, depending on one's point of view.

We agree with the Government that a reformed council tax is likely to be the best way forward, but the emphasis is on the word "reformed". The Liberal Democrats have latched on to what I have conceded elsewhere is a very good slogan—"Axe the tax"—but that is far as their policy goes. A party that wants to campaign under such a slogan is effectively excluded from the grown-up debate on reforming the tax. However, for all the advantages of a property-based tax, the drawback is that property value may be poorly correlated with income and therefore with ability to pay. That is the issue that faces us at the margin and the challenge is to devise a reformed council tax system that recognises the worst problems that it throws up, while retaining its benefits.

When the hon. Member for Northavon was talking about the lack of correlation between the value of property occupied and income in some cases, it struck me that we have lots of taxes that are not well correlated with the ability to pay. For example, the Liberal Democrats are not proposing that duties on cigarettes should be varied according to people's ability to pay. We have a range of taxes, some of which relate to income, and some of which do not. Most advanced countries have a mixed taxation system, and the issue is about striking the right balance. I recognise that if council tax, which takes up a large proportion of the disposable incomes of people on very low and fixed incomes, is to be acceptable, we must address how we deal with that issue in reforming the council tax.

Mr. Davey: The hon. Gentleman wants a mature debate on local government tax reform. Can he now tell us, in one sentence, what are the Conservative party's proposals for council tax reform?

Mr. Hammond: In one sentence, no I cannot. However, if the hon. Gentleman bears with me for a moment, he will hear what I have to say about how our evolving policy will address a couple of specific areas that are directly related to the question of revaluation. I can assure him that when he goes into the next general election, he will not have to debate with Conservative candidates who do not have a policy on reform of the council tax. We will announce our policies on reform of the council tax, unlike the Labour party, which has made it clear that it will go into the next general election without a fully fledged policy for such reform.

If the present system, which is based on 1991 values, produces poor income to value correlations, it is obvious that the 2005 revaluations, after a decade of radically differentiated house price rises, will create a more difficult situation. Even average house price to income ratios differ widely. The hon. Member for Northavon spoke about the situation in the south-west—the well-known phenomenon by which high demand for houses caused by incoming residents, most of whom are retired, distorts the ratio between house price values and incomes in a fairly low income economy. Throughout the country, discrepancies can be even wider on an individual taxpayer basis.

It is clear that reform is needed ahead of the 2007 start date for the use of the revaluation values that will be gathered in 2005. I hope that even the Government will recognise that imposing revaluation on a single, nationwide basis without any other adjustments would cause such a dramatic shift in the tax base between areas that it would lead to an unacceptable outcome. In fairness, I think that the Government have recognised that.

There are two obvious things that the Government—any Government—could do to moderate the unfairness of revaluation, and two things that would make it worse. A fair system of local or sub-regional banding, which has as its objective equitable distribution of the burden of council tax within a billing authority, while leaving undisturbed the distribution between billing authorities, would draw much of the sting.

The hon. Member for Northavon speaks as a Liberal Democrat, and referred to regional banding. We know that the Liberal Democrats have a pathological attachment to regionalisation, but I am not sure that the Government will have the same attachment to it after next Thursday—we will have to see. However, there would be problems even with regional banding, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman, if he considers his own region, will recognise that the differentials within regions are, in many cases, greater than the differentials between them.

We therefore need to consider a banding level that is lower than the region. That would still create winners and losers, but not whole towns and cities that were winners and losers. It would also ensure that whole communities were not penalised en masse because they happened to live in areas of high property value growth. Equally, it would ensure that windfall gains did not go to people who used the same levels of services, and who had the same or higher level of income growth, but who lived in an area that happened to have slower property value growth. The council tax is not intended to be a wealth tax by stealth; it is intended to fund local authority services that are used by all.

Such a system of local banding would be sensible, but a fudged local banding system, paying lip service to addressing the problem, using subjective criteria and shifting the burden of the tax in an opaque fashion between districts, would be a disaster for the credibility of a reformed council tax. I ask the Minister to take that point on board.

[Mr. Hammond]

The other thing that a Government can do is to re-establish fairness and transparency in the discredited grant distribution system, using clear criteria that recognise both local needs and local cost factors. That could be achieved by changes to the resource equalisation arrangements, which would deliver many of the same benefits as local or sub-regional banding, by ensuring that the penal effect of the redistribution of grant through resource equalisation did not occur in an area that suffered an upward shift of bands across the board.

A Conservative Government will commit to introducing a fair and transparent system. In relation to the revaluation, that would require a combination of fair and objective grant distribution mechanisms and/or an objective local banding system, so that when the 2007 revaluation system is introduced, the changes in banding would be used to redistribute the burden of taxation within a billing district. As the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) suggested, it would ensure that people living in the lowest value properties were recognised as such and that the distribution of tax within a community was fair. We start to run into problems when the revaluation and shifting of bands through the resource equalisation mechanism is also used as a covert mechanism to shift the burden between billing authorities as well as between citizens within billing authorities.

Mr. Davey: Is the hon. Gentleman therefore confirming that the Conservatives are in favour of a revaluation exercise of some sort?

Mr. Hammond: We accept that the revaluation will go ahead in 2005. Frankly, with or without a revaluation in 2007, we need a fairer and more transparent mechanism for distributing grant. If the revaluation goes ahead, there is a need to examine the distribution mechanism alongside the banding mechanism, because the two are flip sides of the same coin.

My concern is that a third-term Labour Government would fudge the local or regional banding question, allowing it to become a smokescreen for a redistribution of tax burden to those whose houses had risen in value even though their incomes might not have risen any faster than people in areas with a less dynamic property market. Worse still, a third-term Labour Government would add bands to the top of the current eight-band system and would probably fiddle with the ratios between bands, making the council tax more explicitly a wealth tax by stealth. Extra bands would further redistribute the burden to areas that have enjoyed—or suffered, depending on how one looks at it—exceptional house price rises, while in some areas, very few houses would fall into the new top bands.

There is a case for relief for those who live in the lowest-value properties and may be on low incomes. However, that should not be at the expense of people living in higher-value properties who may not be high-income earners. We do not have to speculate about what a Labour Government would do in office; we can look at Wales, as the hon. Member for Northavon has done, to see what a Labour-controlled Government have done. In Wales, 34 per cent. of homes have moved up a band and only 8 per cent. have moved down a band.

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hammond: The hon. Gentleman walked into the Room only five minutes ago so I will not. I would like to conclude and let the Minister respond.

The Government are being deliberately opaque by kicking the balance of funding review report to the Lyons review and leaving it until after the general election to tell the public what they intend to do. The Minister will no doubt accuse me and the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton of scaremongering and setting hares running, so let us give him the opportunity to set the record straight.

Will the Minister commit the Government to introducing a transparent and independently verified system of grant distribution alongside the 2007 revaluation? Will he commit to an objectively fair local or sub-regional banding system, to be brought in at the same time as the revaluation? Will he pledge that the Government will not introduce new bands at the top of the system or alter the ratio of the top rate to band D?

The Government have accused us of scaremongering; there is a chance here for the Minister to put to bed the fears that council tax bills could double or triple for people who happened to occupy property in the highest new band in a 10-band system. I hope that he will take the opportunity of doing so. The public are looking to him to rule out the use of additional top bands or changed ratios to increase massively the burden of council tax on those who live in higher value properties in areas where property values have increased. If he will not give those assurances, and if he continues to hide behind the Lyons report, the electorate will have to draw their own conclusions.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): I congratulate the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) on securing this morning's debate. It is always good to debate local government finance, as we have done on many occasions both here and in the main Chamber.

I have listened with great interest to the hon. Gentleman's views and those of other hon. Members. The debate is on the impact of council tax revaluation, but although we have covered council tax revaluation briefly, we have also covered council tax itself, local income tax, the grant distribution system, the system in Wales, the balance of funding review and the Lyons review. We have travelled far and wide this morning, and in the brief time available to me I will endeavour to address most if not all the issues that hon. Members have raised. I will disappoint the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) by saying that I shall not pre-empt the outcome of the Lyons review; otherwise, there would be no point in having it in the first place.

It is a pity that hon. Members have thrown around words such as "perverse", "undesirable", "capricious" and "arbitrary"—mainly the hon. Members for Northavon and for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey), I suspect because they want to deflect attention from what is a wholly indefensible system of replacing council tax with local income tax. If I have time, I may come back to that point, but I should try to address the subject of the debate, which is the council tax revaluation.

Let me put on record some important points about revaluation to clear up some misunderstandings. In our 2001 local government White Paper, we recognised the importance of keeping property values up to date, and that it was no longer reasonable or fair that council tax was based on 1991 property values. The legislation for the revaluation is now in place, and both the ODPM and the Valuation Office Agency are working towards delivering that revaluation for 2007.

For the record, I am pleased that the decision to revalue was supported by both the Conservatives and Liberal Democrats during the passage of the Local Government Bill. The hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) said:

> "We recognise the need periodically to revalue properties for the purpose of council tax."—[Official Report, 7 January 2003; Vol. 397, c. 64.]

There is no need to be coy about the Conservatives' supporting revaluation: they supported it wholeheartedly in Committee. The hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) supported a Conservative amendment that called for more frequent revaluation, so I assume that the Liberals also support the revaluation process. Despite all the accusations that the hon. Member for Northavon made about whether it is right or wrong and how it is going to work, the fact is that it is right to have a council tax revaluation, as voted for by the Conservatives and Liberal Democrats in the Bill's passage through Parliament.

So how do we go about the revaluation? In September this year, the Valuation Office Agency announced its intention to use an automated valuation model to assist it in the revaluation. It is currently testing the AVM using a system that has been supplied by a company called Cole Layer Trumble, a company with more than 60 years' experience in mass appraisal valuation. When I visited the VOA's Wimbledon office in September to see a demonstration of the system, I was impressed by not only the technical capability of the AVM system but the commitment, focus and enthusiasm of the VOA staff in making the revaluation happen. Current testing of the model is exceeding expectations, and it is clear that it will be a valuable tool. When the groundwork for the VOA's valuation work is completed, it will be ready to start the detailed work and place properties into bands.

Let me turn to a common misunderstanding about revaluation, which has also affected this morning's debate. Revaluation is not about raising more money overall. Indeed, in our 2001 White Paper we made a commitment not to change the overall council tax yield as a result of revaluation. I hope that that puts to bed the scaremongering that we have heard before and that we heard again during the debate today about revaluation being some form of stealth tax. There is no intention to raise the council tax yield as a result of revaluation.

Mr. Hammond: Will the Minister give way?

Phil Hope: I will just say a few more words about what we intend, because I want to clarify how it will come about.

For the vast majority of people, whose properties will increase in value broadly in line with the average, there is unlikely to be any change in banding. Only where the change in a property's value is significantly above or below the average is the property likely to change bands. So, as we have made clear, revaluation is not about raising more money overall, and anyone whose home has risen in value in line with averages is unlikely to pay more tax. Revaluation is simply about updating the system, which is based on 1991 values—hon. Members should remember that we are now in 2004—and is increasingly out of date. Members of all parties voted for the system, and I hope that they will see that it is now out of date and can no longer be fair or rational. That is why we are undertaking the revaluation.

Mr. Hammond: What the Minister says is obviously right, and the rebanding exercise will deal only with anomalies within individual billing authorities—properties that have risen or fallen out of line with the average. Does he accept, however, that the resource equalisation regime raises the important issue of the distribution between billing authorities, which is somewhat opaque, but which will none the less be the most important consequence of the revaluation?

Phil Hope: There is an issue about resource equalisation, the balance of funding between central and local government and the extent to which localisation and equalisation can go together. Indeed, that occupied much of the debate during the balance of funding review, on which leading Conservative and Liberal Democrat local government representatives served. The review reached several important conclusions—they were not recommendations, and the review was not designed to make any. One conclusion, about which I shall say a bit more in a moment, was that we should retain and reform the council tax. So, the review looked into issues of resource equalisation and localisation.

Mr. Webb: The Minister explained the process of revaluation. Will he now clarify his response to my comments about home improvements? Is it not the case that if I improve my home and add to its value by building, say, an extension, I may push myself into a higher council tax band on revaluation and face a higher council tax?

Phil Hope: There have been press articles saying that we will tax home improvements, and the hon. Gentleman has repeated the point this morning. However, such remarks are wholly misleading. They refer to the consultation that we recently launched on a proposal to include information about additional property attributes in revised council tax lists. The additional information that we might publish could include the number of rooms, including bathrooms, and the age of the property. Making such information public for the first time would make it easier for all council tax payers to understand the basis on which their valuation was made. So, the consultation is not about the basis of revaluation but about improving clarity by making more information available.

Mr. Hammond: Let us just be clear on that point. Although the consultation is not about the basis of the revaluation, the Minister is confirming the hon. Gentleman's fear that the basis of the revaluation is the value of the property as improved.

Phil Hope: I cannot repeat the point without being repetitive. The questionnaire is about publishing better information. Instead of simply saying, "Here is the number and address of the house," we can publish its attributes so that people can see whether the valuation of their property is right. The council tax payer will have greater clarity and information about the basis on which their property and their neighbours' properties have been valued. That will reduce inaccuracies and, I hope, appeals.

Mr. Edward Davey: I am tempted to ask whether we shall count the number of windows and return to the old window tax, which did not work, but I want to ask the Minister about an important point that he made. He correctly said that council tax revaluation would not necessarily increase the yield from council tax. There is no dispute about that. Our proposal for a local income tax would not increase the overall tax burden. However, will he accept that council tax revaluation will cause some people to lose?

Phil Hope: The purpose of the revaluation is to provide updated property values, because currently the council tax is based on 1991 property values. The revaluation will provide an updated and therefore fairer and clearer basis on which to levy council tax. That seems an entirely sensible idea. The hon. Gentleman supported it in Committee when the Bill was going through Parliament; indeed, the Conservatives supported that position. Whether there are winners or losers will depend on the outcome of the revaluation and the council tax banding. That is the subject of the Lyons review, which I shall come to in a moment. To say that there will be winners and losers is to say that the sun may or may not rise in the morning. Of course there will be changes, but we do not know what they will be until the revaluation takes place, the council tax banding decisions are taken, and we put the two together. Unfortunately, the scaremongering by the hon. Members for Northavon and for Kingston and Surbiton and, to an extent, by the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge—although his comments were rather more judicious than those of the Liberal Democrat Members—is unhelpful, because it raises fears that are wholly unnecessary and unjustified.

I shall now deal with some of the other questions that hon. Members have raised. I want to explain the revaluation in Wales, because that was the subject of the remarks of the hon. Members for Northavon and for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams). The revaluation in Wales will take effect from 1 April 2005, based on values as at 1 April 2003. I emphasise that council tax bands in Wales are the responsibility of the Welsh Assembly Government. Revaluation in Wales should not be seen as a precedent for revaluation in England.

I thought that Liberal Democrat Members supported devolution. Indeed, the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire said that he did—except on this occasion. He cannot have it both ways. This is an opportunity for the Welsh Assembly Government to make their choices, but I emphasise that their choices are not a precedent for revaluation here. The Welsh Assembly Government have decided to add a new band at the top but not at the bottom. That is purely a decision for the devolved Administration in Wales. We might learn from the Welsh experience, but it is not a precedent or an indication of what is likely to take place in England. No decisions have been taken on how council tax might be reformed in England. I shall say more about the independent inquiry by Sir Michael Lyons in that regard.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire made a point about park homes. The reply that he received from my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local and Regional Government was correct. I cannot say anything more about what the Welsh Assembly Government have decided to do in Wales—this is a devolved matter—but I have noted the hon. Gentleman's concerns and will take them into account. Indeed, this entire debate will feed into the Lyons review process when we consider the issues relating to park homes and other properties of that type.

My hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths) gave the example of difficulties in Reading. She was right to focus on issues relating to properties on the boundaries; that is where all the arguments take place. They are taking place now and they will take place in the future, once the revaluation takes place and the new banding system, whatever it turns out to be, is proposed. The Valuation Office Agency will put great efforts into valuing properties on band margins, because that is where the problems lie. We want to ensure that we get the revaluation right. People in the middle of a band will not be so bothered by this. It is people on the margins who will be most concerned, and the agency has made getting the revaluation right first time a major priority.

I regret that I cannot promise to give Reading borough council special treatment in respect of the rate support grant, but I will certainly write to my hon. Friend about interest payments. She made a good point on that issue. In relation to the residents in her constituency to whom she referred, I understand that the proposal is that the VOA accepts responsibility for reimbursing, with an appropriate amount of interest, those council tax payers who have overpaid. Perhaps I can write to my hon. Friend with further detail on that, but I am grateful that she raised it in this debate, as it is important that we represent our constituencies in that way.

With little time available, I want to emphasise the importance of what we are doing on reform of local government finance. There have been two major reports on the local government finance system. The housing, planning and local government committee in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister published its report on 16 July and on 20 July my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local and Regional Government announced the publication of the balance of funding review report.

It is highly significant that both reports concluded that council tax should be retained but reformed. The Liberal Democrats have decided to take the path of replacing council tax with local income tax, but that has been shown by both the Select Committee and the balancing of funding review to be a mistaken path. For example, Professor Glen Bramley told the Select Committee that "it would be a great mistake to abandon council tax".

As the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge said, it is appropriate to assign taxation on fixed properties to local government. The Select Committee and the balance of funding review, on which Liberal Democrats served, both came forward with the view that we should retain but reform council tax, but still the Liberal Democrats will go into the next general election with the foolhardy policy of replacing council tax with local income tax. The party will suffer the consequences of that policy when the electorate tell it what they think of it.

Let me pick up a couple of points that were made about the nature of the council tax reform. The Government's position going into the next election is clear. We wish to retain but reform council tax. The Lyons review will look at other issues associated with the balance of funding between central and local government. To remind hon. Members, the balance of funding review concluded:

"There is a clear case for reviewing council tax bands and the ratios between them at the time of revaluation."

However, the review warned that "particular care is needed to ensure that council taxpayers on low incomes living in high value properties are not unfairly affected."

That is something that all hon. Members have mentioned this morning. To take another example, the review concluded that the detailed case for and against a sub-national approach to revaluation should be considered, in order to take account of differential movements in house prices in different parts of the country. However, the report also advised that further work was needed to determine the best solution.

Liberal Democrat Members have quoted the NPI report—a good report—that was submitted to the balance of funding review. It is because of the complexities that that report highlighted the importance of the Lyons review. In regard to that, it was noted that the case for the sub-national approach might be weaker if the current national divergence in property prices continued to close. People on fixed low incomes, particularly pensioners, can also be vulnerable to small changes. The review noted that a fair and effective council tax benefit would be a vital component of a reformed council tax package.

Unfortunately, I do not have time to give our analysis of the Liberal Democrats' local income tax proposals, although we have done that on the Floor of the House on many occasions. However, whatever the Liberal Democrats decide to go into, we would welcome their submission to the Lyons review. I understand that Sir Michael Lyons has invited the leader of the Liberal Democrats to submit evidence, and I suggest that he take advantage of that opportunity.

One thing that has been demonstrated this morning is that local government funding is a complex issue. My hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East referred to the poll tax, and the lessons of history suggest that before we make decisions on reform we must look at the implications for all the different groups affected and get those decisions right. Such reform is far too important to be rushed for political reasons, despite the Liberal Democrats' wishing us to do so. I hope that we have a spirit of constructive dialogue, that the scaremongering stops, that the analysis begins and that, as we face the many challenges and changes in central and local government over the next few years, the funding regime that we introduce supports change for the long-term and the sustainable future of local government in this country.

Local Government Finance (Lincolnshire)

10.59 am

Mr. Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): May I say how pleased I am to see you in the Chair, Mr. Sayeed? I am delighted to have secured this important debate in order to voice my concerns, as well as those of many of my colleagues, councillors of all political parties, my constituents and the people of Lincolnshire, about the inadequate and unfair share of Government funding that is given to Lincolnshire local authorities.

I have for some time been drawing attention to the transfer of resources away from Lincolnshire and setting out my arguments about it. Recently, my view and that of my colleagues has been supported by clear evidence in statistical analysis compiled by Lincolnshire local authorities. That demonstrates that authorities in Lincolnshire receive significantly less Government grant support than other local authorities in England. That is grossly unjust.

I hope that the Minister will listen carefully to the facts and arguments and deal with the inequitable circumstances affecting the people of Lincolnshire. The Government need to look carefully at the way in which funding is allocated between local authorities, so that the needs of Lincolnshire—a mainly rural, but fast-growing county—can be met.

In Lincolnshire, we receive 19 per cent. less grant, per head of population, than the English average. That means that our local authorities have £104 less to spend on each person, compared with the average English local authority. The provision of public services has already been put at risk as a result of that underfunding, and I shall elaborate further on specific examples of that.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that that effect is reinforced by the fact that the proportion of spending funded by the council tax has steadily risen from 25.35 per cent. in 1997–98 to 31.46 per cent. in 2004–05? That is aggravating the situation that he is so ably describing.

Mr. Simmonds: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for making that point. I shall repeat that set of statistics later; it is clear that the provision of public services has been put at risk because resources have been transferred away.

The detailed analysis by the Lincolnshire local authorities has revealed some very stark statistics. Funding at the national average for Lincolnshire would allow a 37 per cent. or £15 million increase in spending on the police, a 66 per cent. or £18 million increase in spending on roads, a 4 per cent. or £15 million increase in spending on education, a 25 per cent. or £33 million increase in spending on social care and a 6 per cent. or £9 million increase in spending on waste collection and disposal, recycling, street cleaning, leisure facilities and other local services. Alternatively, council tax could be massively reduced by 28 per cent.—the equivalent of a £315 reduction in council tax for the average band D property.

The Government have assessed Lincolnshire's needs as well below the national average for all services, but the exponential growth of Lincolnshire's population has put great strain on the public services provided by local authorities. From 1991 to 2001, Lincolnshire's population increased by 10 per cent. compared with the national average of 2.7 per cent. That figure includes not only people moving to Lincolnshire from the midlands, as they have done traditionally, but those going to Lincolnshire from the south of England to take advantage of the disparities in house prices.

Lincolnshire is predominantly a rural county and the costs of sparsity and access to services in rural areas have not been adequately recognised by the Government. In addition, the Government targets distort priorities, because of inadequate understanding of rural communities. Local authorities, including county, district and borough councils and the police authority, have been left with no option but to increase their share of the council tax to meet the rising costs of public services. The council tax, as my right hon. and learned Friend has pointed out, covers a constantly increasing share of local authority spending in Lincolnshire as the proportion funded by Government grant declines.

The figures that my right hon. and learned Friend gave are correct. In 1997–98, council tax was 25 per cent. of Lincolnshire's funding. By 2004–05, the figure had risen to 31 per cent. That is exacerbated by the fact that there are significant pockets of socio-economic deprivation in Lincolnshire. In comparison with many areas of the country, incomes in Lincolnshire are relatively low. That means that local people pay a higher than average share of their earnings in council tax. Nationally, council tax as a percentage of annual salary is 4.3 per cent. In Greater London, it is 2.9 per cent., but in Lincolnshire it is 5.2 per cent. That is exacerbated by the fact that the average annual salary in Lincolnshire is £5,000 less than the national average salary of £25,000, and £16,000 less than the average annual salary in Greater London of £36,000.

Specific examples could, I am sure, be mentioned from all over Lincolnshire, but I want to draw on one in my constituency. Boston borough council has been forced to increase its council tax by 9.8 per cent. this year. The council was unfortunately perilously close to selection for capping by the Government. However, that was not the fault of Boston borough council, but rather of central Government who changed complicated funding formulae without considering the implications. The reasons for that are too complicated to explain this morning, but they involve transfers of revenue support grant and of housing stock. None the less, that is a significant issue, as Boston borough council estimates that it is £496,000 worse off for the next two years as a result, and that it will continue to lose out on a significant scale in the coming years. There is a direct correlation between council tax increases and the transfer of resources away from Boston and other parts of Lincolnshire.

I have written to the Minister on several occasions, highlighting the difficulties facing Boston borough council. On each occasion, he and his colleagues have failed to address the predicament faced by the council. I have the Minister's last response in front of me this morning and I am sorry to say that it is nothing short of a disgrace. I have written to him again asking for a more detailed reply to my initial letter, and the people of Boston and I await his latest answer with great interest.

I now turn to Lincolnshire police authority, which was singled out for special pernicious treatment as the only police authority in England and Wales to receive a reduction in grant per head. Lincolnshire police received £103.72 in funding per head of population for 2002–03, but only £102.31 for 2003–04. As a result of that inadequate funding from central Government, Lincolnshire police have become increasingly reliant, as have local authorities, on funding raised through council tax. The authority now relies on council tax for 25 per cent. of its funding. In this financial year, the authority said that it needed a 5.3 per cent. increase in Government grant to maintain the same level of service, and yet it received nothing like that figure. Given that Lincolnshire is the fourth largest county by area, and has the second fastest growing population, that is totally unacceptable.

Mr. Hogg: Will my hon. Friend also make the point that in the forthcoming year the police authority will face an exceptional charge on pensions of £1.9 million owing to the fact that an exceptionally large number of officers is retiring?

Mr. Simmonds: My right hon. and learned Friend makes a good point. As I understand police authority funding, the only way in which it could fund those additional pension costs is by a reduction in front-line services. One criticism regularly made at my surgery is the severe invisibility of the police in my rural constituency. The point to which my right hon. and learned Friend referred will have a direct negative and detrimental impact on that provision of service.

The police authority is extremely disappointed by the lack of support from central Government, which will bring further difficulties in policing remote and rural areas. I agree with the chairman of a Lincolnshire police authority committee, Councillor Martin Hill, who summed up the situation as follows:

> "While Lincolnshire has continued to suffer a raw deal in terms of financial support, we have succeeded in delivering effective and efficient policing."

Were the Government to provide Lincolnshire police authority with funding at the national average, there could be a £15 million increase in spending on the police force. That could be spent in a variety of areas, including on putting more officers on the beat and on greater visibility and presence, which is what my constituents want. A recent survey conducted in my constituency confirmed that tackling crime was the No. 1 priority for the residents of Boston and Skegness. That underlines the importance of adequate and proper police funding in Lincolnshire.

One of the main differences between Lincolnshire and most of the rest of England is that it is predominately rural and communities are often far apart, which means that we rely heavily on the road infrastructure. That adds to the cost of providing services in the rural areas. However, the road infrastructure in much of Lincolnshire, particularly in my constituency around Boston, is ailing and hopelessly inadequate. There is a real need for a bypass around Boston.

Statistical evidence supports the view that Lincolnshire receives below average funding for transport infrastructure, maintenance and development. If Lincolnshire received funding at the national average, there could, according to the Lincolnshire local plan, be a realistic £18 million increase in spending on roads and on improving cycleways and public transport. That could be spent on improving the roads, and could make a major contribution to facilitating a bypass for Boston. Sadly, the problems on Lincolnshire roads, particularly in my constituency, look set to continue while the Government remain in power.

Let me comment briefly on education funding, which comes from the local authority, particularly the county council. I accept that problems in school funding have been a factor in many parts of the country, not only in Lincolnshire. Last year, there was a severe schools funding crisis throughout the country, as many schools' budgetary costs increased as a result of higher employer national insurance and pension contributions. However, the problem in Lincolnshire seems to have continued this year.

The Lincolnshire Secondary Heads Association recently said that Lincolnshire schools received less this year than those in most other parts of the country. One college principal in Lincolnshire, whom I will not name, remarked:

> "Why are they"—

school children—

> "not entitled to at least the level of funding that other young people are in similar counties around us? It means that schools can't employ the teaching and the non-teaching staff and buy the equipment they need for a modern educational system."

I entirely agree, and I do not see why the young people of Lincolnshire should be penalised.

Lincolnshire is fortunate enough to have retained grammar schools, which have provided generations of young people, some of whom are from very poor backgrounds, with an excellent education. In the Government's new five-year education plan, however, Lincolnshire grammar schools are under threat. I wrote to the Secretary of State for Education and Skills demanding equal and fair treatment for all schools, including grammar schools, but unfortunately he failed to give a commitment to the fair treatment of selective schools in Lincolnshire, which will be controlled by the manipulation of funding streams. Local authorities have calculated that if Lincolnshire received Government funding at the national average level, an extra £15 million could be spent on education—most of it, I hope, on front-line services in schools.

What can be done? In the short term, the Government could ensure that the grant settlement for next year is based on data available from the 2001 census. Currently, some 1991 census data are being used, to the detriment of authorities such as those in Lincolnshire whose needs are rapidly changing and whose populations are increasing significantly. The grant settlement should also be based on the latest population estimates. The current practice of using data that are at least two years old disadvantages authorities such as Lincolnshire that have rapidly expanding populations.

The ceiling on grants must be reviewed, as local authorities with rapidly increasing needs cannot be fully compensated through the grant system given the current ceiling. Government grant funding arrangements should be simplified and made more flexible. The ring-fencing of grants to specific areas is unhelpful and engulfs an enormous amount of management time.

[Mr. Simmonds]

I strongly recommend that the Government make funding arrangements more flexible so that local authorities can meet increased needs and demands.

Sadly, such a manoeuvring of resources away from Lincolnshire is not limited to local authorities. To some extent, it is also true of the health service, particularly dentists and the Lincolnshire ambulance service. Despite the hard work of the professionals and those who try to make the public services work, all these Lincolnshire services are suffering from being ignored by the Government. I hope that I have shown that the county of Lincolnshire has consistently lost out under the Government. I fear that this is part of the Government's ongoing and deliberate attempt at resource redistribution. Resources are being moved away from rural shires to the inner boroughs that are the Government's traditional political heartland. I hope that that trend will cease forthwith. I do not ask for special treatment for Lincolnshire or for the people of Boston and Skegness, but I do ask for our fair share. The people of Lincolnshire are not receiving it, and we demand that that changes.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): I congratulate the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness (Mr. Simmonds) on securing this debate on funding in Lincolnshire.

The Government have high aspirations for local government, which we continue to match with proper investment. Before I comment on specific issues raised by the hon. Gentleman, I shall say a few words about the real improvements that we have made to the funding of local government since we took office and which are set out in the latest spending review.

I am pleased to say that we have been able to continue the considerable investment that we have been making in local government since we took office. That investment has seen a real-terms increase in grant of 30 per cent. since 1997. That compares starkly with the 7 per cent. real-terms cut in grant that councils saw in the last four years of the previous Government, of whom the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) was a member.

Mr. Hogg: In that case, will the Minister please tell us why the council tax funded 25 per cent. of spend in 1997–98 and in 2004–05 is projected to fund 31.46 per cent?

Phil Hope: I will come to that point in detail, but the simple answer is that it is because Lincolnshire authorities have been increasing council tax substantially, despite significant increases in grant each year in the past five years. I shall give him those figures in a few moments.

The other bit of bad news for the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness is that, if there were a change of Government, his councils would be in extreme difficulty. We announced our spending plans up to 2007–08 just before the summer. They mean a £7.2 billion increase in general grant for local government programmes by 2007–08 over 2004–05; 4.8 per cent. more a year above inflation in the level of local authority capital investment; and continued funding for the neighbourhood renewal programme. Funding for local authorities' emergency planning responsibilities will also be increased and there will more money for private finance initiative credits.

That contrasts with the shadow Chancellor's position, which is to impose a cash freeze in the first two years of a Conservative Government, were one—heaven forbid—ever back in power. A cash freeze on the local authorities in Boston and Skegness would wreak havoc on the services that the hon. Gentleman has so eloquently and rightly defended. He would like further increases in grant. As well as securing a debate in this Chamber, he might like to secure a debate in his own party about its policies on local government finance.

We hope shortly to announce the provisional local government finance settlement for 2005–06. That will include decisions on floors and ceilings. I will come back to the specific point about Boston. Local authorities will know that we are considering the operation of the ceiling for next year in areas of rapid population growth. I can confirm that the latest population estimates provided by the Office for National Statistics—those for mid-2003—will be used in the grant settlement. In addition, the ONS has released revisions of the mid-2001 and mid-2002 population estimates that were used in the 2003–04 and 2004–05 settlements respectively. We are committed to amending the grant distribution in those settlements to take account of the new figures.

We have also announced that the 2001 census data—other than on population—cannot yet be used in the settlement. That is because using updated data would require the recalculation of many of the formulae used in the settlement, which would break the formula freeze to which Ministers committed themselves following the formula grant review in 2002.

Authorities in Lincolnshire have benefited from the extra money that we have made available since taking office. Lincolnshire county council received a grant increase of £30 million, or 7.8 per cent., in the 2004–05 settlement, which is above the average for county councils. The district councils also received good grant increases, with most authorities receiving grant increases well above inflation.

Mr. Hogg: Must the hon. Gentleman not also address the absolute figures? He will know, for example, that the North Kesteven rate support grant per head of the population is £122 less than the national average. Those are the absolute figures.

Phil Hope: The right hon. and learned Gentleman refers to the North Kesteven settlement. General grant to North Kesteven council has increased yearly between 2001 to 2004–05 by 6.3 per cent. That is the average yearly increase and it is well above inflation. The council has introduced council tax increases of more than 6 per cent. a year. So, it has had a 6 per cent. yearly increase in grant over the past three years, and has raised council tax by 6 per cent. over those three years. Given those figures, it is difficult to understand the statement that the council has not had sufficient resources to provide services.

I remind hon. Members that Boston borough council received an increase in 2004–05 over 2003–04 on a like-for-like basis of 6 per cent. There were also increases of 4.2 per cent. for East Lindsey district council; of 3 per cent. for Lincoln city council; of 5.9 per cent. for North Kesteven district council; of 5.2 per cent. for South Holland district council; of 4.5 per cent. increase for South Kesteven district council; and of 7.7 per cent. for West Lindsey district council. All but one authority in Lincolnshire received grant increases of above the average for similar tiers of authority in 2004–05.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness is right to demand more money for services in his area. However, I say to him that since the Government were elected in 1997 we have provided those extra resources on a consistent basis. The past three years have seen substantial increases in grant to his authorities. He is right to come to this Chamber to demand more, but I hope that he appreciates that the figures demonstrate that those moneys have been given.

I shall now deal with some of the specific points that the hon. Gentleman made about particular areas. He has written to me about various complicated matters concerning formula [illegible] and, in particular, about the impact of large-scale voluntary transfers. This week, he will again receive a letter, to clarify some of the issues that he has raised in correspondence with me.

Let me make it clear, however, that whatever the system for distributing formula grant to local authorities, we can only distribute a fixed pot, because there is only a certain amount of money to give out to local authorities. Distribution formulae do not confer entitlements to exact amount of grant. Decisions have to be taken on how to make the formula system work with the amounts available, and floors and ceilings are one way of doing that. However, even if we did not have those, it would remain true that in the circumstances of any particular year, a council could not rely on the formula to deliver a particular amount of grant.

We introduced floors and ceilings in 2001–02 for education authorities and then extended them to cover all authorities in 2002–03. We have reviewed their operation each year. We have always calculated floors and ceilings to provide an increase based on the actual grant received by a council in the previous year, after allowing for changes in funding and function. We have made two refinements since: one on schools funding, and one that relates to shire districts by adjusting the base position to allow the revenue grant consequences of recent capital investment allocations to come through over and above the ceiling or floor. We did that because we took the view that capital investment deserved special treatment.

I am aware, from correspondence and other mechanisms, that Boston would have wished us to exclude from the grant ceiling formula grant increases that resulted from a transfer of housing stock under the previous arrangements. In principle, it would have been feasible to make other adjustments for other cases, and we did consider adjusting for the result of voluntary housing transfers. We took the view, however, that the benefits of making many further adjustments did not outweigh the considerable disadvantage of greatly complicating an already very complex grant system.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness also raised questions about funding for Lincolnshire police. I assure him that ensuring that there is good and proper funding for the police service remains a top priority for the Government. Lincolnshire will receive a general grant allocation—Home Office police grant, revenue support grant and redistributed business rates—of £60.6 million, which is a cash increase of £1.9 million over last year. If the funding formula alone had been applied, Lincolnshire would have received a grant of £60.1 million, but because of the floor of 3.25 per cent. on top of last year's grant, it will in fact receive £60.6 million—£500,000 more. The operation of the floor in the case of Lincolnshire police has benefited them to the tune of £500,000. That is a significant contribution to delivering better police services in the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

The Lincolnshire force will continue to benefit from additional resources from targeted programmes. Lincolnshire will receive resources from the crime fighting fund, the rural policing fund and the basic command unit fund, and money for Airwave, for the DNA expansion programme, for special priority payments, for community support officers and for capital grant—an additional £7.65 million. Most police authorities receive a similar range of grants. The hon. Gentleman is right to press for resources for better policing in his constituency and we are right to have delivered it to his police authority in the past few years.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the matter of education funding. Lincolnshire has had an increase in total recurrent funding of £880 per pupil in real terms since 1997, which is a huge investment in children's education in the county, and the Government are proud of that. Lincolnshire's schools formula spending share increase this year is 6.1 per cent per pupil, which is above the national average. Lincolnshire also receives transitional grant of £600,000 this year—and a further £300,000 in 2005–06—to help schools in the greatest difficulties, which the hon. Gentleman described, to balance their budgets by 2006–07. We recognise the difficulties that can occur, even with the extra money, and have responded positively.

The measures that we have introduced for 2004 to 2006 have restored confidence in the school funding system. As part of the funding settlement for next year, we have guaranteed all schools a minimum per-pupil increase of 4 per cent. for secondary schools and 5 per cent. for primary and nursery schools. That will promote continued stability and certainty for schools, and it has been welcomed by representative teachers, head teachers and school support staff on the work force agreement monitoring group.

Mention has been made of council tax. Our spending plans will provide overall above-inflation increases in funding for local authorities. In common with the rest of the public sector, councils need to be more efficient and we expect local government to contribute significantly in that respect, delivering at least £6.45 billion-worth of efficiency gains. Putting aside party political points, I suspect that there is agreement on both sides of the Chamber on the need for greater efficiency in public services, including local government services. I am pleased that the Local Government Association is committed to delivering those savings, which can and will be invested in front-line services.

[Phil Hope]

There is considerable variation between authorities in their scope for making future savings, but in local government as a whole there is scope for efficiency savings of about 2.5 per cent. a year in procurement, back-office reforms and so on, which is 7.5 per cent. over the next three years. Those savings are possible because they have been demonstrated by some innovative partnership agreements set up by local authorities, and by some local e-government initiatives for which I, as Minister, have been responsible. We will work closely with local government and with the Audit Commission to ensure that those gains can be achieved and delivered to improve front-line services.

We have worked hard to improve the local government funding formula and taken steps to ensure that all local authorities receive sufficient support and to provide a stable financial climate, as I hope I have shown in the debate. I hope that I have not been too robust, but I feel strongly about the matter. Lincolnshire county council and the district authorities in the area have benefited directly from this Government's extra investment in local government. We want local authorities to continue to improve local services. We set out in our latest spending review the framework for delivering them, while allowing local authorities to ensure that council tax increases are at an acceptable level. I cannot emphasise too strongly that we expect next year's council tax increases to be in low, single figures. Authorities will need to play their part through continued efficiency savings, but we will work with local government to help them to do so.

Coal Health Claims

2 pm

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): This is ordinarily a popular subject for an Adjournment debate, so I expect a full complement of speakers and I do not want to take too much of the time available in introducing the points I shall focus on.

I have chaired the English regional sub-group of the monitoring group on coal health claims, covering Derbyshire, Leicestershire and Nottinghamshire, for the past four years or so. At the end of last month, nearly 3,200 claims for respiratory disease damages and just over 1,500 claims for vibration white finger had been submitted from South Derbyshire residents. Taking the two schemes together, a little over one third of claims have been fully settled or withdrawn or denied. Settlements commenced on both sets of claims in 1996, but the bulk started to be settled only in 2001. Anyone unlucky enough to be subject to a policy dispute may have been waiting many years for any form of offer or settlement.

It has been claimed, both by Government advisers and the solicitors claimants group, that the sheer volume of claims for chronic obstructive pulmonary disease was unexpected. That view was strongly expressed by the solicitors claimants group at the last monitoring group meeting, and I found it surprising. Virtually all hon. Members present represent constituencies where substantial groups of former mineworkers live. As soon as it was clear that family members could make claims on behalf of deceased mineworkers, most people expected a vast claims mountain to accumulate. Most of us also recognised that as soon as any closure date was announced on the scheme, those who handle claims, and those who farm for them, would vigorously seek to increase the number of claims made by the final date. I find it stunning that the volume of claims submitted has come as a great surprise to the solicitors representing the claimants.

The huge task of processing 570,000 claims for COPD—I shall touch on both claims schemes at various points—is, I imagine, the largest claims process for damages in the United Kingdom and probably in Europe, and it presents issues of process management and of focus of expertise, which should have been clear to the parties to the process at an early stage. It was clear that there were significant complexities in discovering the work history of mineworkers. In many cases, pits were closed and records either destroyed or woefully incomplete because no one had imagined that they would be required for this purpose. National health service records for those who died more than 10 years ago are kept only in exceptional circumstances. For those reasons, collecting information was always going to be a challenging task, particularly on behalf of deceased mineworkers.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Nigel Griffiths): I do not want to take up time, Mr. Sayeed, because I shall respond in full later, but it may be helpful if I point out that deceased miners and their rights were envisaged and built into the original court judgment, rather than their emerging later. When the initial calculation was made, in all good faith and taking that fact fully into account, it was estimated that 100,000 or fewer miners might be eligible for compensation. The figure is now six times that.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (in the Chair): Order. Many hon. Members want to take part in the debate. If interventions are brief, I shall be grateful.

Mr. Todd: I appreciate that, Mr. Sayeed. This subject could be debated at length, but I do not want to do that. We can all claim expertise in hindsight. I have a record, which has been laboured to some extent, of pressing for some years for changes in process within the scheme. I find it frustrating that the two parties to the process have only recently decided that they can move to an accelerated system for dealing with the volume of claims that they face.

It is right to congratulate the Minister on one step that he has taken to deal with the expedited process. Once it was recognised that we needed to accelerate claims—otherwise, no settlements would be found for many people until almost the end of the decade—he facilitated the process of designing a scheme that has many merits. It has cut out medical examination of records, used the data that we have already collected on the average of settlements made, and accepted the principle of discounting in cases in which it is difficult to obtain proper information, which many well-advised claimants will understand. Those design elements are sound, but I know from talking to colleagues, some of whom are here today, that the most important is the acceptance that any expedited process cannot be mandatory and that it would be wrong to tell claimants that they must accept the expedited offer or leave the scheme and pursue their claim by a civil process. That would be manifestly unfair, and I am delighted that the Minister took the initiative in saying that that would not be the Government's position in representing the coal industry.

There are other circumstances in which expedited offers might be seen as reasonable. I have been startled by the process introduced to handle services claims for vibration white finger. Although the overwhelming majority of claimants are alive and have had their hands examined so that the disability that they suffer is well known when they claim, they have to go through a further medical examination to test their fitness and whether they require assistance services to do things that most of us, albeit incompetently in my case, can do for ourselves, such as DIY, gardening and cleaning around the house, which they cannot do because of the damage to their hands.

My view, which I have expressed repeatedly, is that an expedited system for handling services claims would make sense. Many VWF claimants just want to see the end of the process, and having an overhang on services that may run until 2007 does not suit them. Provided that a fair mechanism was designed to remove some of the complex and expensive steps involved, it would be worth while to examine an expedited process for offers on that element of the outstanding claims.

We also need to reflect on the unit costs of processing claims. All of us know that the costs of handling claims, compared with the offers made at the end of the process, are widely resented in mining communities. The fact that the cost of solicitors, claims handlers, IRISC, the medical team and so on examining a claim and producing an outcome is sometimes far higher than the offer at the end of the process is regarded with considerable resentment.

Mrs. Helen Liddell (Airdrie and Shotts) (Lab): My hon. Friend makes an important point. One dimension that has changed in relation to coal health claims is the intervention of claims-handling companies and rogue solicitors' firms that see these claims as a dripping roast. I postulate that the number of claims, which at 570,000 is six times higher than was expected at the beginning, may be a consequence of claims-handling companies and so on coming into this arena. I am interested to know whether my hon. Friend has any suggestions as to how we deal with the problem of those who are exploiting miners and the families of deceased miners.

Mr. Todd: I welcome what my right hon. Friend says. We all recognise that unscrupulous claims handlers have added to the pile of claims. They have sometimes done so when most people would say that there was no substance to the claim and that they have simply induced people who have the most vague notion of what they may be involved in to submit a claim because they want to claim the proceeds on their own behalf. Obviously, such matters have been pursued; my hon. Friend the Minister will be well able to comment on some of the steps taken to deal with the more unscrupulous practices, and I do not want to detract from what he will say. My only suggestion is that we should try to maximise the information available to potential claimants.

The finish dates for the schemes have passed, so the opportunities for the sharks have gone away: they are probably circling in the water elsewhere in the system to try to find ways of making money. However, what has happened has been an illustration, from which we need to learn, of how innocent people can be exploited by people with narrow aims of their own.

I shall rattle through some key points. On vibration white finger, I have found that many claims for damages have been denied on the basis that the jobs a man did failed to fit within the list of occupations. I am talking about group 3 claims, as most of us will know of those. Subsequent checks by IRISC after longer experience of the scheme produced information about significant errors in the initial categorisation. I was stunned that of some 15,000 claims referred back to be checked as group 3 claims, 2,500 or more were recategorised as group 1 and 2 straight away through a manual exercise. That suggests an error level that we should not be prepared to accept.

It also suggests that in relation to some claims rejected early in the process, particularly those involving solicitors with little mining knowledge—one weakness in the English system, in particular, is that many solicitors with relatively little mining knowledge have been involved—the problem has been that initial rejection on the basis of occupation has simply led to the claim being denied and time running out. It has been argued powerfully that the initial denials need to be reviewed to check whether the error level found in group 3 categorisation might also apply to the initial denials. I understand the argument that the solicitors should have briefed their clients more effectively and should have responded to the issues that arose when the initial denial occurred. However, we all, as practical people, must understand what has happened, which is that where solicitors of poor quality were involved, they may well not have done that. In the interests of justice, we should ensure that it is done.

When evidence is produced, another aspect of VWF that causes problems is the pursuit of witnesses by loss adjustors who appear to demand a level of proof in handling the claim that is much greater than one would usually expect in a civil court process. That affects the number and quality of witnesses and the quality of information that those witnesses provide about exposure to the relevant tools. As was discussed heavily in monitoring group meetings, I urge a more sensitive approach and a recognition of the need to understand the principles of the level of proof on exposure required in the basic civil process.

Finally, there is a small number of surface-only claims in my constituency. Common sense tells us that people exposed to surface dust in the dusty environment in which coal is sorted have been exposed to as much dust as most underground operators. The position taken until now may have been based on medical advice, but it simply flies in the face of the intuition of most of our constituents and, frankly, of all of us. We are seeing an early move towards quite properly including surface claims in this process so that they can be handled as quickly as possible.

This has been a major issue for the residents of South Derbyshire. The area has benefited substantially, but in the cruellest way. So far, £14 million has been distributed to my constituents, and I understand that a great deal more will eventually be delivered. However, it will have been delivered out of injury and tragedy, compounded by some of the processes imposed on the system and by the legalistic way in which some of the scheme was thought out.

We all recognise that we would not have pursued the matter in this way if we had started the process back in 1996—the Government were not in power then—and if we had decided how to define a sensible scheme to deal with the predicted outcome that we have. We would have delivered a faster and better outcome for the many claimants whom we represent.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (in the Chair): Order. I point out to any colleagues who want to speak that there is only a limited amount of time in which to do so. Seven colleagues want to speak, so I ask each of them to limit their contribution to about five or six minutes, and then everyone will be able to make one.

2.18 pm

Adam Price (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr) (PC): I congratulate the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) on securing this important debate, which is particularly timely, given some of the changes to which I shall refer.

There is a sense of frustration that we must continually scrutinise the scheme in this way, and although the hon. Gentleman is right that the Government are not to blame for all the problems associated with the scheme, they have certainly created as many problems over the years as they have solved.

I shall briefly refer to three aspects: the new scheme for minimum payments; the new Government rules on unassessable claims; and surface workers. I echo the hon. Gentleman's comments on surface workers.

I welcome the Government's rejection of a compulsory system for minimum payments. Something had to be done. Some 54,000 claims are made a year, and there are 400,000 outstanding claims, so at the current rate of settlement, a claim would be settled in 2011—some 14 years on from the court case. That would clearly be unacceptable.

I would, however, like the Minister to address cases that have already been settled but below the new minimum payment. Does he agree with the unions that a top-up should be paid in respect of cases already settled at less than the new minimum payment? That precedent was set by the previous improvement in the expedited offers, when people who had received less than the minimum payment under the new, expedited scheme received a top-up. Surely that precedent should be used in this case.

I move on to claims that are unassessable—in the Government's view, that is—which are those of colliers who died without medical records. Last week, the Department of Trade and Industry put before Lord Justice Turner some new proposals on what it called unassessable claims. Those proposals said:

> "There will be deceased claims which fail to be assessed under the scheme where insufficient notes to enable the claim to be assessed by a respiratory specialist—whether this be after the rejection of an optional risk offer earlier in the process or not. The Department's current thinking is that there is no basis on which such claims can be assessed and they should therefore be denied."

We should like some clarity from the Minister—the most important thing today. How does he define those cases that fall within that paragraph? What is the definition of unassessable? I would point out to the Minister the early-day motion in the name of the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham), which reflects the feelings of many coalfield Members.

In September 1999, when the Government signed it, the original handling agreement specified how to deal with such cases. Where there were no medical, coal board or benefits agency records, assessors were to be allowed to use the death certificate and a claims questionnaire to make a judgment. Every claimant who had those two documents was to be allowed to proceed with the claim. It would be beneficial if records had been preserved. To be fair to the unions, they called on the Government to ensure that as many records as possible were preserved at the beginning of the scheme. If that has not happened, it is not the unions' fault, and it is certainly not widows' fault if records have been destroyed. We would like from the Minister the Government's definition of unassessable, because another meeting with Lord Justice Turner is planned for next month. We coalfield Members need the information from the Minister today, because the suspicion—rightly or not—among many in the coalfield is that the DTI is trying to avoid paying out to tens of thousands of miners. Today is the day on which the Minister can allay those fears.

Finally, in relation to surface coal workers, I entirely agree with the hon. Member for South Derbyshire. We have heard the case for that from so many hon. Members over so many years. We even have the Government contesting surface dust claims. If those miners lose, the Government will force them to cover the legal costs. That is immoral, in my view. Dust levels in washeries and coal preparation plants were in many cases worse than they were in mines. Another Department, the Department for Work and Pensions, has recognised pneumoconiosis as a prescribed disease for surface workers and dock workers working with coal, but the Government see matters differently in relation to this scheme. That is not sustainable. Here is an opportunity for the Government to allay fears about new rules that are unacceptable for miners' widows and in relation to a relatively small group of workers who have suffered enough. They should be treated equitably by a Labour Government.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) on having secured the debate. In my constituency, the Labour Government's implementation of the coal-handling agreement has been welcome. It has paid out more than £10 million to former coal miners and families.

However, the way in which certain members of the legal profession and claims handlers have descended on a constituency such as mine and greedily plundered people's compensation is nothing short of a national scandal. I raised that issue in a debate on 3 March, and I cannot understand why there has not been a bigger outcry nationally. As I said then, I can only assume that national newspapers and others are not interested because it is not happening in leafy middle England.

In the debate of 3 March, I mentioned a case involving the Newcastle law firm Mark Gilbert Morse, which charged claimants 25 per cent. of their compensation in addition to the fees that it received from the Department of Trade and Industry. That was totally unjustified and, as I said on 3 March, was pure greed. I am pleased to say that, following the helpful intervention of the Minister and the Law Society, and thanks to publicity from the Newcastle Evening Chronicle, those fees were paid back to claimants. In the cases that I highlighted, more than £50,000 that was wrongly plundered from my constituents' compensation has been returned to them.

The Law Society assures me that Mark Gilbert Morse has paid back all moneys that it deducted. I asked the Law Society to give an overall figure, but it could not, which shows some of the weaknesses in its self-regulation policy. I ask anyone out there in the coalfields of the north-east, or anywhere else, who has been a client of Mark Gilbert Morse and has not had his or her deducted fees back to please come forward. Also, I challenge the Law Society to ensure that we get a proper breakdown of the wrongly deducted moneys that Mark Gilbert Morse paid back to its clients.

It is annoying that companies such as Mark Gilbert Morse knew that it was wrong to deduct those moneys, but that absolutely nothing is being done against them apart from their being forced to pay it back. The Law Society is toothless when it comes to bringing any kind of sanction against such firms. There is a growing call for the self-regulation imposed by the Law Society to end and for some other form of regulation of solicitors to be introduced.

Claims handlers, or claims farmers as I call them, have descended on many coal-mining constituencies like vultures. Such firms are totally unregulated, are represented by people who are not qualified solicitors, and have been set up purely to exploit the coal handling arrangement. Such people call themselves compensation advisers or legal advisers, although 99 per cent. of them have no legal qualifications whatever and are simply middlemen, but they do not make that clear to the people on whom they call. They often approach elderly people on their doorsteps. In the worst case that I dealt with, an 83-year-old in Beamish was forced to sign an agreement on her doorstep, although she clearly did not have a claim because her brother, whom the claim was for, died in 1952.

In other cases, companies have held meetings in working men's clubs and have sometimes purported to be from representative trade unions. Indeed, some of the firms' representatives are former union officials. Such firms make their money by charging claimants administration fees or deducting a percentage from their compensation. I have been told that they sell claims to firms of solicitors. Two solicitors' firms in Newcastle have informed me that they have been approached by claims-handling firms wanting to sell them claims.

The relationship between solicitors and claims farmers needs to be investigated urgently. In the debate of 3 March, I discussed the case of my constituent, Mr. Jobes, who had more than £3,000 of his compensation deducted by a claims farmer called Industrial Disease Compensation Ltd. of Ashington, Northumberland. IDC passed his case on to a firm of solicitors in Liverpool called Silverbeck Rymer, which, on completion of the claim, deducted the money to cover IDC's costs under the agreement that Mr Jobes had signed.

The Law Society is pursuing the case, and I thank it for its involvement. It is unclear what cost IDC incurred. In a letter to the Law Society dated 13 October, Silverbeck Rymer stated that the agreement with IDC was justified because such claims were being vigorously denied and no compensation scheme existed at the time; charges levied by IDC were intended as an indemnity for payments of other parties' solicitors and disbursements incurred; and there was an element of risk in such claims. At the time, however, that was total nonsense.

Silverbeck Rymer was first instructed about the case on 5 February 1999, but the judgment that set up the coal handling agreement was given in 1998. So, when the firm took the case from IDC, it knew that the scheme was under discussion and that it would not have to enter into litigation. It was also a member of the claimant group of solicitors, so it was well aware of developments. Indeed, the judge at the time warned the claimant group not to incur any unnecessary disbursements while negotiations were taking place on the scheme.

When it took on the case, Silverbeck Rymer knew, as IDC did, that there was no risk at all. When the handling agreement was put in place in September 1999, it also knew that its costs would be covered and that the DTI would not attempt to recover costs from claimants in cases that failed. Why, then, did it deduct the money and pass it to IDC? I do not know. I challenge both firms to explain why the money was deducted and to return it to Mr. Jobes.

I know of many similar cases in the north-east and elsewhere. This case angers me because a decent, hard-working constituent has had his compensation plundered in a totally appalling way. I am aware that there are other such cases, and I ask the Minister urgently to investigate IDC in particular, because what it is doing is daylight robbery.

2.32 pm

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): It is a pleasure to appear under your chairmanship for the second time today, Mr. Sayeed. I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) on obtaining the debate, because the ongoing scheme needs scrutiny at all stages.

Where compensation has been delivered to families and individuals whose lives have been ruined by disease, it has brought justice. However, several claims remain on the books, and hardly a week goes by without either myself or my office being approached by people who are having difficulty with their claim or with its slow resolution. As has been said, such things would have gone on for many years if something like the minimum payment scheme had not been brought in.

It is not only individuals, but areas that have benefited from the payments. However, a huge amount of money has also gone into the coffers of solicitors. Some have been very efficient and effective on behalf of their clients, but others have been less so. We have not had such problems with unscrupulous solicitors in the south Wales area, although claimants who have engaged solicitors from outside the area have had that experience. There is certainly evidence of claims being handled very inefficiently, and one firm sent a family a lot of confidential and sensitive legal documents that related to a completely different claim from the one that the family was pursuing. That caused both the family and the people involved in the other claim considerable concern.

In the short time available, I want to speak about two issues. One, which has already been touched on, is surface workers. Some people who worked on the surface were subject to even worse conditions than those who worked underground. Furthermore, the job titles describing the activity in which they were involved differed from coalfield to coalfield, as did the conditions in which they did their jobs. I therefore ask the Minister to consider the possibility of decisions being made on the basis not of job title, which, as I say, varied from coalfield to coalfield, but of the conditions and medical history that the surface workers set out in their claims.

The main issue that I want to raise is about those people who spent part of their time as miners and colliers not in the nationalised industry but in private small mines and the difficulty that they have in bringing their claims to a satisfactory conclusion. As hon. Members know, many such claims are pursued on behalf of the widows or descendants of those miners, so information about the record of their employment history is even more difficult to obtain with any certainty. However, I have been assured, by answers to questions that I have asked the Wales Office for instance, that a policy would be developed shortly to deal with such claims.

It therefore came as a great disappointment when I received a letter from Mrs. Carpenter, who was making a claim on behalf of her late father, Mr. Morris. The letter, addressed to Mrs. Carpenter from her solicitor, said:

> "I have been in contact with the Defendant's Insurers and unfortunately, your claim cannot currently be progressed as the claim is subject to a Policy Issue. I asked for this issue to be explained and basically they are unable to provide an offer until new software is developed in relation to the PMF element"— the private mine element—

> "of your claim. The Defendant's Insurers do hope to have the new software in place as soon as possible".

Will the Minister indicate when such claims can be addressed and brought to a conclusion? A number of people are hanging on, sometimes in very poor states of health, and their lives could be radically improved by the compensation due to them that they have not received.

2.37 pm

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd). The debate is timely, because the Department of Trade and Industry, together with the claimants group of solicitors, is seeking the court's approval to make adjustments to the scheme. That is what I want to concentrate on.

I am a member of the English monitoring group, which was established by my right hon. Friend the Member for Airdrie and Shotts (Mrs. Liddell). The group's purpose is to try to ensure that the scheme continues, overcoming blockages that can occur with the insurers, who are very much involved, and the solicitors; and to report to the Minister. The coal-handling scheme was established in 1999, after 18 months of discussion and negotiation between solicitors for both sides. The scheme has worked well, albeit not as fast as some would have liked. That is why we are considering how we might speed it up. The Minister has suggested introducing standard payments for certain categories of claimants, and I think we all agree that that would help speed up settlements.

At the same time, there are concerns about some of the suggestions that, I understand, the DTI made in the court on 18 and 19 October. In particular, I refer to the new concept of the unassessable case. Will the Minister clarify what an unassessable case is? Under the handling agreement, there is provision to settle cases with a paucity of medical evidence, so that a case with, for example, only the death certificate, together with the form that the widow has completed, could be settled with an offset—that is, a discount. That provision seems to have worked well, but there is now a new concept, of the unassessable case. It seems to solicitors that it is the DTI's intention to rule out an unknown but potentially large number of cases.

I received a letter from the claimants group of solicitors only two days ago. The penultimate paragraph states:

> "I trust you will agree that it would be wholly wrong for the DTI to seek to exclude deceased cases in the way apparently contemplated, particularly when they were expressly catered for under the coal handling agreement from the start and in many cases the lack of British Coal records is a result of British Coal's inappropriate continuation of their destruction."

That refers to the fact that, after the case was taken to court in 1996, British Coal continued to destroy some records. Consequently, not every case registered will have a record that can be traced through British Coal's archives, which are based in the midlands.

Will the Minister clarify the new concept of the unassessable case? In doing so, will he say how many cases are likely to be disallowed or stopped from proceeding if the unassessable case concept is implemented? There have been a number of other suggestions. Medical contractors suggest that a little tweaking to the medical assessment process would allow them to complete all the medical examinations required within three years. Again, the Minister may wish to comment on that, because the medical contractors have completed a document for the court, which was made available to the DTI before the hearing.

In conclusion, I ask the Minister to reconsider the surface work issue. He has heard from many colleagues that mining communities feel strongly about that. Many of us who know the industry are aware that surface workers in certain areas of the colliery worked in extremely dusty conditions. Will he consider allowing certain categories of surface workers to make claims? That would mean bringing in a new claims procedure especially for those surface workers who worked in certain areas of the colliery, but we could do that.

David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) on securing this debate. I shall not go over ground that has already been covered, such as problems with the legal system, but shall talk about my personal involvement in the issue, which can be important.

As an ex-miner, I realise how the problems have come about. As a councillor in my local area, I proceeded with a number of cases, as all hon. Members present have done. I spent hours, nights and weeks trying to assist people to fill out the appropriate forms to get to the stage that we are at now. Since I became an MP, continuing cases, such as those we are now discussing, still stand out as my biggest case load. Partly, that is because I am recognised as being an ex-miner. Many people come to me because they know me, and because I live in the community I represent—I was born and bred there.

The amount of money secured is important. In Midlothian, £9.5 million has already been paid out in cases of vibration white finger. For cases of chronic bronchitis and emphysema, £9.5 million has been paid out with a lot more to come. In Scotland, £98 million has been paid out in cases of chronic bronchitis and emphysema, and £64 million has been paid out in cases of vibration white finger. By September, £1.2 billion had been paid out in the whole of the United Kingdom. The concept of providing such an amount of compensation for industrial workers is the first of its kind that I have ever known, and the Government should be congratulated on that. Let us not forget that it was this Government who delivered that package; it would not have been delivered by any other Government. We are entitled to make criticisms when we have them, but we should not lose sight of the fact that we are debating an issue that would not have been debated had things been left to another Government.

Two or three early-day motions were tabled in my name yesterday and last week. We are concerned, in spite of all the good work that the Government and we have been doing and the work done by previous Ministers. My right hon. Friend the Member for Airdrie and Shotts (Mrs. Liddell) is to be congratulated on setting up the framework for many of the cases that we are now dealing with. The Minister who followed her, my right hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), took on the same mantle. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Nigel Griffiths)—the Ministers are all Scots, I notice—continues to carry through the good work of his two predecessors, so that we do not have this great victory taken out of our jaws.

The amount of money that I mentioned earlier sounds like an awful lot, but let me put it in personal terms. An old lady in my area, who has known me since I was born, came to me, and I sat down to read through the form with her four years ago. She then got an award of about £3,000, and of course she was tickled pink—she was over the moon. She did not have very much money—she never has had—and she lost her man quite early in her life and has a family of eight. I told her that that was not all that was going to come, and later on she received a further £60,000. We are talking about a group of people who have never seen that level of income in their life—that is the human aspect. Those people have never had that amount of money; the sad thing is that her man is lost, and although each of the eight members of her family received £1,000, one had already died, so that she received a further £1,000 on top. That is the sad, but good, thing that happens in such cases. That human aspect is not always considered in relation to the cases that go forward.

Two issues are really important. Private and small mines are a big issue, not just in south Wales or certain parts of the English or Scottish coalfields, and that has to be addressed. That concerns people who worked in the private mines all their lives. The second issue needs to be dealt with effectively and could include miners who worked for the National Coal Board and then for British Coal before the pit was privatised or turned into a private mine. That person's settlement cannot be made until the facts and figures about his employment with the private mine have been released. He may have worked with the private mine for only one year of a 40-year or 30-year service, but he cannot get a single penny because of that.

Mr. Roger Williams: The hon. Gentleman raises a point that I could perhaps have spoken about. Often, miners are quite prepared to have that small piece of their service in a private mine disregarded in order to settle the claim. However, it seems that that cannot be achieved.

David Hamilton: That is a very good point. I have already seen a number of cases where people have disregarded the second part, just to get the claim dealt with. That is unfair and wrong. However, in a number of cases people throughout the coalfield are in that category. It is surely not beyond the realms of possibility for the Minister or the Department to settle the claim while waiting for the outstanding claim on the final part to be done. I believe that that could be done with the stroke of a pen.

There is one more thing to discuss, which concerns surface workers. When I started in the pit, there was an old saying: "You start on the hill, you go down the pit, and you finish on the hill." A man's body was so wrecked by the time he finished in the coal industry that he had to finish back on the surface. I acknowledge that the Government recognise that someone with five years' underground service qualifies anyway, irrespective of whether he ended on the surface.

Let us think of the change that took place even over the short time I spent in the industry—some 20 years. In 1965, I worked in what they call a washery, and a couple of hundred people worked in the pit. When I left the pits, unceremoniously, during the miners' strike in 1984–85, Monktonhall colliery had 2,000 men, and a prep plant that produced 1 million tonnes of coal a year.

Mr. Kevan Jones: As a former miner, does my hon. Friend agree that dust levels in the screens and washers were higher than some underground? My constituent, Mr. Ken Lynne, who worked in the screens comes into my surgery every month gasping for air, and he cannot claim. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that dust levels were perhaps higher in the screens than they were underground?

David Hamilton: Yes. I was coming to the point about the major change in the coal industry when the mega pits, as they were called, began to be introduced. In the mega pits, the miners did not move around to different jobs; a person who was brought in to the baths stayed in that job for the rest of his working life. My hon. Friend's point about where someone worked on the surface is valid. Some people who worked on the surface never worked in the prep plants, and conversely, there are people who worked in the prep plants who never worked anywhere else. It is grossly unfair for those people to be disqualified. Records are available from witnesses by word of mouth—ex-managers, for example—that would confirm where those people worked in a particular period. There are ways forward; I am proud to be part of a Government that has delivered so much for a group of people.

There has been a lot of talk about the court case, but as far as I know whatever that court decides it will not be applicable in Scotland. There will, therefore, be a major division between MPs, because the legal position in England and Wales does not apply to the Scottish courts. The agreement at present is between the National Union of Mineworkers, Scotland area, and the Department of Trade and Industry. Rest assured that if there is a problem in relation to the courts, the Scottish area will step back from it and it will end up in the Scottish court. We have such a big success record behind us—we are on the last track to that success story—and we want to take the scheme forward and make it work for everyone.

Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough) (Lab): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) on securing this important and timely debate. I shall not detain hon. Members too long, as many of the points that I wanted to make have already been made.

I reiterate the point made in early-day motion 666 on 24 February, which formed the basis of my Adjournment debate on 9 September: there is a pressing need to establish a minimum compensation payment for miners suffering from chronic bronchitis and emphysema; after all, solicitors are guaranteed an average of £2,200 for every CBE claim they deal with.

It would be remiss of me not to add my congratulations to the Government on implementing a scheme that has put more than £72.5 million into the pockets of people in my constituency alone. Barnsley always vies with Easington about who has had the most money, and I do not know who has had the most at present; it is a photo-finish. There are only 69,000 people on the electoral register in Barnsley, East and Mexborough, and £72.5 million has gone to 12,500 former miners in the constituency, which is fantastic. However, the case for a minimum payment scheme is overwhelming because an analysis of the claims shows that about 150,000 have been settled so far. Roughly, half the claims are live claims—the miners are still alive—and half are bereavement claims. If we established a minimum compensation payment to speed up the process, we would get the money to as many miners as possible who are still alive. Miners suffering from chronic bronchitis and emphysema are not getting any younger, and if we do not pay them shortly, the percentage rate and balance will change quickly. If we cannot make the full payments, we should make further progress on delivering interim payments.

A closer look at the analysis shows that two thirds of the full and final offers already made were for less than £5,000. Just under half the claims settled so far were for less than £2,200, which is the amount of money that the solicitors are guaranteed. Further down the scale, 22,000 claimants have received less than £1,000, some 10,000 former miners have received full and final payments of less than £500, and about 3,500 miners have received less than £200. How can we justify giving compensation of less than £200 to someone whose lungs have been so badly damaged while we pay solicitors a guaranteed £2,200? That cannot be right.

I want to repeat one example that I quoted in my September Adjournment debate, because it is appropriate to the point I am making. It concerns a miner who worked in the coal industry in Derbyshire. An ex-miner with 13 years' experience, he was found to have chronic bronchitis and emphysema. His unapportioned award was assessed at £5,304, but using the handling agreement calculator, the recoverable proportion, after taking his smoking into account, was just 0.31 per cent. of the total, resulting in an offer of £17.64. So he received £17.64 for 13 years underground, while his solicitor got at least £2,000.

I know that, after consultation with the claimants' solicitors, consideration is being given to introducing a minimum compensation payment. We heard earlier from my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) about the standard payment initiative, which is currently being negotiated, but will the Minister update the Chamber on the situation as regards establishing a minimum compensation payment, rather than a standard payment?

A minimum compensation payment would serve a number of useful purposes. First and foremost, it would speed up the process and allow more miners to receive their compensation while they are still alive. It would, I hope, cut the current end date from 2011 to 2007 or thereabouts. A minimum payment might also cut the money going to solicitors. That may sound harsh, but we should look at ways of trying to get more money from the solicitors' pockets into the miners' pockets, and that might be a secondary outcome of establishing a minimum compensation payment. I have great difficulty in morally defending a derisory compensation payment of less than £200 to some of my constituents when solicitors get an average of £2,200. In the long run, a minimum compensation payment of £1,500 could actually save the Government money. I hope that the Minister will continue to give serious consideration to that important point.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): This debate focuses on the tragic human legacy of our coalfields. We have heard a lot of speeches from Members who represent coal-mining constituencies or have worked in coal mines, which give us, as one Member said, the human flavour of the subject. I want to reinforce one or two of the points that have been put to the Minister, and it seems to me that much of the problem relates to the complexity of the scheme.

My connection, such as it is, with the industry is that I have been down pits, although not to work; I had an association with the co-operative at Monktonhall, which the hon. Member for Midlothian (David Hamilton) will know about; and I had the honour—or privilege, or perhaps I should say surprise—of marching through Edinburgh shoulder to shoulder with Mick McGahey, the Scottish miners' president, at the last Scottish miners' gala before that folded, not least because the pits had pretty well all disappeared by then.

I do not regard myself as an honorary member of either of the unions, but I have huge respect for people who have worked in the industry. I want to make it clear that if any of the things that I say grate, they are not intended to show any disrespect for those people. I absolutely agree that they deserve to be compensated for what they have suffered.

I happened to be at lunch today with Derek Ezra, former chairman of the National Coal Board, and I mentioned that this debate was coming up. He said to me, on the issue of pneumoconiosis, that he was the chairman at the time when £100 million was paid into the fund, and that dealt with it; yet now we are talking about £7 billion for the remaining compensations.

I accept entirely that the Government have established a scheme that should have been established long ago. I give them credit for that. I do not give them credit for the scheme as it is functioning. It has been made too complicated. Cynically, I sometimes think that it is deliberately too complicated. As a consequence, many miners die before they receive any compensation. Even their estates—their widows, and others—are dying. My challenge to the Minister is that if the Government are serious, they must find a way of dealing with the matter expeditiously. It is in everyone's interest to bring it to an end and pay out what is needed in compensation.

I am sceptical, because the Government are very good at setting up schemes and getting headlines, but there are all kinds of rules. For example, we have it on the record that the Government's expectation for, and whole funding of, the minimum income guarantee to pensioners is based on the fact that more than 1 million pensioners will not claim it. The challenge to the Minister is whether we can find a way of showing that we want to get the money to the miners by a method that is clear and simple and that can be processed fast.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Clearly, the hon. Gentleman is paying tribute to the Labour Government for delivering the scheme to many of my constituents, among others, but does he know that some of the complexities of the scheme are not down to the Government, but result from decisions made by the judge and the court? Some of what the hon. Gentleman describes is not in the hands of the Minister and the Government.

Malcolm Bruce: That is a slightly questionable point. If Governments set up complicated schemes, they create a field day for lawyers. Governments have the capacity to change the legislation or a scheme in a way that would cut out the lawyers. Several hon. Members have quite reasonably and understandably complained about the costs and lawyers' fees being taken from money that should go to the deserving miners and their families. That is a serious and fair point, and under a simpler scheme the compensation would not be a case for the courts, but could be administered without reference to solicitors or other lawyers.

Hon. Members they should make common cause. A feature article from The Guardian of 18 September asks:

> "Who is to blame? The County Durham claimants all blamed Labour, the party they had supported all their lives but which they believe is now run by young, middle-class political advisers who know nothing about mining communities."

That is clearly not true of the hon. Members who have spoken in the debate. The passage continues:

> "The compensation scheme was poor, they insisted, because no one cared enough to make it better."

Mr. Jones: Clearly, The Guardian has become a mouthpiece for the Liberal Democrats. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that in my constituency, and in Durham as a whole, many thousands of people are grateful for the compensation that they have had. They have thanked the Labour Government; they do vote Labour.

Malcolm Bruce: That is fine, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will make sure that it goes out on his leaflets. Those who have received the money have every reason to be grateful. However, we have heard several things about the compensation—it takes a long time; some people do not get it in full; some are dead before they get the substantial amount; and many people are still waiting and being processed. Hundreds of thousands have not received anything under the scheme. Of course, the ones who have benefited are grateful.

I have constituents who are retired miners who have retired to the fresh air of north-east Scotland, and I can quote one who had been through the whole process. By the time he got to me he was, to use a phrase from our area, scunnered with it. He had marginally failed to qualify, having been put by the tribunal through two medical examinations, in spite of the fact that the union medical advisers were clear that he qualified to be compensated. He was told that he did not qualify because he had "only" chronic bronchitis. Other hon. Members have probably heard about such cases many more times than I have. It is a pretty desperate deal. I asked a Government Minister for advice, and I received some sound advice as to what that constituent could do but, not surprisingly, the constituent said, "I have no intention of doing that, I have had enough; I really do not wish to exercise my rights any longer in this process. I have finished with it," and he was not prepared to take it any further.

I suggest to the Minister that many of his colleagues are saying—he has been quoted as hinting at it himself—that a clear simplification of the scheme might achieve the right result. In an ideal world—I agree with the points about private mines and about surface workers—it would be better to say, "You were that category of worker and you had that many years' service. Without medicals or anything else, you qualify for that amount of money." If it were possible to devise a scheme of that kind, there would not be tens of millions of pounds going into lawyers' pockets; it would be going to the miners. The interesting thing about the destruction of National Coal Board records, which is obviously a matter for concern, is that the Inland Revenue ought to have records for the period going back to the beginning of the scheme. Whether it requires legislation or not, the Inland Revenue might be able to help where the National Coal Board cannot. The Minister is shaking his head. Perhaps he can answer that point. Clearly, there has to be a point of qualification.

It seems demeaning and insulting to put people through such tests and then tell them that they are, marginally, not ill enough—they have not inhaled enough dust to qualify. That seems a degrading way to treat people, rather than saying, "You clearly worked in that environment for a considerable number of years," which should be enough for them to qualify and justify a payment.

The final point of concern, which the hon. Member for Midlothian alluded to, is the difference between the Scottish and English situations. Let me link them. If the Government could come up with a simplified, catch-all scheme that applied uniformly across the country, they might avoid the possibility of challenges in different courts and the fact that an English court, while it might set a precedent, would not automatically resolve the matter under Scottish law.

I conclude by saying to the Minister that the whole House recognises, as the claims demonstrate, that hundreds of thousands of people—mostly men—and their families have worked in those conditions over many years and have suffered appalling consequences to their health. I give credit to the Government for acknowledging that and setting up the scheme. I do not demur from that. However, I can tell the Government that they will lose a lot of good will among their own supporters if they do not deliver the end result in a timely, fair and expeditious way. My challenge to the Minister is to come up with a scheme that is less litigious, more practical, more easily resolved and quicker, and to ensure that the miners get their just desserts while they and their families can still benefit.

3.9 pm

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): I will not detain the House long. I am aware that hon. Members are waiting to hear the Minister's response to this important debate. I congratulate the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) on having introduced it. I seem to remember a similar debate in this Chamber a few months ago, which I think was initiated by the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham). That another debate is taking place shows how important people feel the issue is, and that there are one or two problems with the scheme's administration.

In considering how the scheme was set up, I have to agree with the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) that it is complicated. I suppose that it was inevitable that it would be so, given the number of claimants and the difficulties in assessing health, and therefore what compensation people are due. Given, as we have heard, that many people have received payouts, we could say that the scheme is working reasonably well, considering its complexities. However, I am concerned, and not only as a result of my own research. I was also concerned to hear the hon. Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough (Jeff Ennis) say that although a number of his constituents had been well compensated, quite a few had received a derisory amount, some £200, when the claims handlers would be receiving something like £2,200. When that is the case, we have to ask the Minister again whether nothing can be done to make the system fairer.

We have heard in the past that solicitors have double claimed. From the information that I have, I believe that not many have, and I know that the Minister has written to solicitors who have been accused of double claiming and has reported those who have not replied to the Law Society. However, according to information that I have managed to find, of 173 complaints received by the society, 63 have been concluded, but repayments have been made in only 23 cases, so there is still some way to go. As I said, only a relatively small number of solicitors have double claimed, but to prove the benefit of the compensation scheme, it is important to bring justice to them and, indeed, to the people who should have been compensated.

It needs to be said that some solicitors have done quite well out of the scheme. I think that the most profitable group of solicitors has received almost £50 million. When one considers that it has dealt with a great many cases, one can say, "Well, perhaps that is fair enough."

However, we should remember that many of these cases will be much the same, if not all the same, so perhaps we should look at what is really happening.

Claims for deceased miners were mentioned. I suppose that they are the saddest of cases and will be the most complicated, but the Minister would do himself justice if he went into detail in describing not only that scheme but any changes proposed to it. There seems to be doubt about what changes are proposed.

Finally, will the Minister update the parliamentary answers that he has given by letting us know when he expects all claims to be settled? In other words, what is the completion date for compensation payments due to people who in the past, let us face it, kept this country going? I recognise right now that there have been disputes between mining unions and Conservative Governments. However, as someone who grew up in mining areas, literally next door to a coalfield, and whose father was a miner—he told me one Christmas that I got present only because he had had an accident, albeit a fairly small one, down the mine and was compensated for it—I have a natural sympathy for the miners who are claiming compensation and I am proud and pleased to align myself with the hon. Members who have spoken so far.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Nigel Griffiths): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) on securing the debate and giving me the opportunity to update hon. Members on the progress made in meeting the health liabilities of British Coal, and on the review to speed up compensation payments that is being undertaken by Sir Michael Turner, the judge responsible for British Coal respiratory disease litigation. I shall respond also to the points that my hon. Friend and others made. My hon. Friend chairs the regional monitoring group on coal health claims for Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire and Leicestershire, so he speaks with considerable authority on the matter. I am sure that he will want to correct the 1996 date that he inadvertently gave in his speech, since the High Court judgments were not handed down until 1998.

I thank all hon. Friends and hon. Members who have contributed to the debate. As I said in the last Adjournment debate on the subject, this is about justice and securing justice. As was said earlier, the Government are administering the largest health compensation scheme in history. We have made payments—of up to £370,000—to almost 430,000 sick miners and their widows or families, with an average payment of £7,340 per case of chronic obstructive pulmonary disease and £7,970 for vibration white finger. Some 92,000 payments, totalling £1.1 billion, cover the damage to health caused by vibration white finger, and 238,000, totalling £1.2 billion, cover the damage to health caused by respiratory diseases. In summary, we have paid £2.3 billion to approximately 430,000 miners. In my hon. Friend's constituency, we have so far paid nearly £15 million to almost 2,700 sick miners or their widows.

My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough (Jeff Ennis) asked how payments of less than £200 could be defended. The simple answer is that they cannot. I am therefore happy to confirm that we are negotiating on a tariff system that would wipe out those minimal payments of £200 or less and replace them with a series of fixed payments to miners. I shall say more on that later.

Hon. Members will know that I want to see everything possible done to accelerate payments and tackle the backlog of claims. Many of the claims were submitted this year, and they mostly cover those miners who were less affected by lung disease. I am advised that half the claims come from former miners whose lungs show no medical effects of disease on their function. There are also many claims from families of miners who died many years ago, for whom there are no medical records. We always planned to compensate families of deceased miners, but not if there is no medical evidence. In November, the judge will decide the minimum evidence needed in the cases of deceased miners.

To tackle the backlog, we have recruited every available lung specialist in the UK. Around 200 of the 600 qualified respiratory consultants are contracted to us to tackle it.

Some time ago, my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire suggested that we use GPs to assess estate claims—the claims of miners whose widows have also died. My predecessor considered that, but concluded that because the top respiratory specialists were having difficulty in assessing such claims, GPs could not be expected to have anywhere near the expertise required. Today, my hon. Friend revisited that matter in respect of vibration white finger and suggested simplifying the process by rolling together the two medicals that may currently apply.

The first medical is designed to assess general damages. It is designed specifically to assess the extent of the claimant's vibration white finger, examines that condition only and is carried out by specialist doctors. The second medical relates to services that will compensate for the lack of ability to carry out household tasks and is used to assess conditions other than vibration white finger that affect the claimant. The second medical is carried out only for those who have claimed for services—not all claimants are eligible for services compensation. I am sorry to inform my hon. Friend that to subject all claimants to a single medical covering both general damages and services would be a waste of resources and would subject claimants to unnecessary medical tests. It would add to the bureaucracy rather than reduce it.

Mr. Todd: Will the Minister reflect that if we continue with the process as so far defined, services claims, which have not yet all been submitted, will be settled perhaps sometime in 2007? Would it not be easier to set out a simpler paper-based solution to claims based on the evidence collected so far, which could be offered at a discount to reduce the cost to the scheme of going through the second medical?

Nigel Griffiths: No, it would not be practical. My hon. Friend's clever and thoughtful idea for GPs to do more of the assessments was rejected by all parties on the basis that specialists were required. I do not rule out Sir Michael Turner's examining aspects of the process that will meet our common aim of ensuring that the time taken to deal with the backlog is reduced.

[Nigel Griffiths]

In July, Sir Michael instructed solicitors representing claimants and the DTI to examine ways of tackling that backlog. On 22 September, he instructed the DTI and the claimants' solicitors to consider how mandatory offers might be made so that medical resources could be focused on those most likely to be ill. Together, we examined risk offers based on the calculation that about 70 per cent. of people would accept the average figure already awarded and accepted by claimants with a similar disability. Those were not the miners whose lungs were more clearly damaged—they will continue to be fully medically assessed.

We know from claims already settled that only 6 per cent. of claimants whose spirometry tests show normal lung function are deemed by the consultant to have measurable disability, and even then, at low levels. The remaining 94 per cent. are found to have no measurable disability and therefore receive no or very little compensation. The judge asked the parties to consider making mandatory offers to those with normal lung function on the basis of a spirometry test. He believes that avoiding putting such claimants through a full medical assessment would have a significant impact in shortening the scheme and would allow medical resources to be focused on those most likely to be ill. However, I recognise concerns that a minority of people made mandatory offers might have received higher compensation if they had gone through the whole medical process. That is why the offers will not be mandatory in the terms that we have proposed to the judge.

Hon. Members representing miners accepted that introducing the option of rejecting a tariff offer and having the option to request a full medical assessment would delay clearing the backlog as quickly as a mandatory scheme would do it. I agreed that the offer would be voluntary. Under Department proposals, spirometry levels will be split into four categories, with an average payment to be calculated for each category of live claimant based on recent compensation settlements. Cases in which spirometry tests indicate chronic obstructive pulmonary disease will automatically go through to the medical assessment process as before. The judge is currently considering the proposal, as well as the claimants' solicitors' proposals to have six categories and for payments to be higher than the average already settled. I imagine that Sir Michael will have to rule on whether that is fair to people who have already settled.

Sir Michael has asked the Department and the solicitors to consider separately how best we can speed up the processing of claims by the widows and families of former miners. My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) asked directly about deceased miners, and I hope that I covered that in my earlier comments.

Adam Price: Will the Minister give way?

Nigel Griffiths: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman is trying to intervene, because I was about to address his point. I emphasise that this has never been a cost-saving exercise. The Government's and the judge's objective is simply to speed up the settlement process. I deplore the actions of Plaid Cymru and its agent Bleddyn Hancock who, in the South Wales Evening Post on 15 October, made the ludicrous claim that the Department was speeding up the process to save £600 million in administrative costs. That sort of alarmist statement, made without foundation, is typical of Plaid Cymru, which has still not said what it has done with the £13 million that the National Association of Colliery Overmen, Deputies and Shotfirers South Wales pocketed from administering the scheme. I therefore will not take lectures from Plaid Cymru about the greedy lawyers in this case.

Adam Price: Will the Minister take an intervention?

Nigel Griffiths: Willingly, if the hon. Gentleman will justify what has happened to that £13 million.

Adam Price: I simply want the Minister to answer the question asked by his hon. Friend the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) which is why must we change the perfectly acceptable arrangements agreed by the Government and set under the agreement for cases where there is a paucity of evidence if those arrangements have worked until now? What has changed?

Nigel Griffiths: The arrangements for cases in which there is a paucity of evidence were envisaged at the beginning of the scheme. Sir Michael Turner now has to decide whether the arrangements are adequate to ensure that payments are made to miners. As I made very clear, the scheme was never envisaged for cases in which there is no medical evidence, rather than where there is a paucity of evidence, which was, I believe, the phrase used by my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone and echoed by the hon. Gentleman just now. We want Sir Michael to recommend the way forward in cases in which where there is absolutely no evidence so that we can ensure that settlements are fair.

So far as surface-only claims are concerned, the original judgment did not cover miners who had worked solely on the surface. The expert medical advice is that respirable dust levels on the surface of coal mines were insufficient to cause chronic obstructive pulmonary disease in the great majority of cases. Surface workers' claims for COPD cannot be paid on a scheme basis under the claims-handling agreement for respiratory diseases. As Minister, however, I instructed the miners' solicitors to have access to British Coal archives to assist them to find evidence to support the case on behalf of affected miners.

Following the latest court hearing on 4 and 5 October, the judge gave the claimants' solicitors until 18 November to secure funding for any litigation from the National Union of Mineworkers, the Union of Democratic Mineworkers, the National Association of Colliery Overmen, Deputies and Shotfirers, NACODS South Wales and others. I will be happy to report back on that.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): Like all hon. Members, I welcome the efforts that have been made to speed up the claims process. We can also see the good progress made by the number of offers being made and the number of cases being closed. However, cases involving small mines are the largest single group of my priority cases to be held up. I wonder whether the Minister could give us some comfort as to when he expects a final agreement.

Nigel Griffiths: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that issue, which has been raised by other hon. Members. Negotiations have been difficult and protracted, and have been frustrating for everyone involved. However, as I announced in the spring, the claimants' solicitors and the small mines representatives have, following mediation and negotiation, been able to resolve the remaining difficulties.

As a result, small mines will now be included under the terms of the claims handling agreement. The Department is working with the other parties and its claims handlers to put the settlement reached into operation. As a result of this settlement, small mines claimants should be able to move from interim payments to full and final settlement. I will take a close interest in that and report back to hon. Members.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire on raising this important issue and on giving me the chance to keep Members up to date on the Government's position. I am sure that I will have other chances to ensure that we are kept fully up to date on this very grave issue on which we seek to achieve together so much justice for people.

Tetra Mast (Perry Barr)

3.30 pm

Mr. Khalid Mahmood (Birmingham, Perry Barr) (Lab): Tetra masts are being erected all over the country as the emergency services install new radio systems. However, there are fierce debates among residents, local authorities and scientists about their effect on health. For the past 12 months, my Labour action team and I have been supporting the residents in the Baltimore road area of Perry Barr. They do not want the 15 m Tetra mast tower on their doorstep. More significantly, they do not want a potential health hazard and actual eyesore next to a primary school that serves 700 children between the ages of three and 11.

When my constituents first told me that the operating company, mmO$_2$, had erected a mast without any consultation with the community, I was unaware of the unscrupulous tactics of mobile phone companies. I was astonished to learn that they exploit a flaw in planning guidelines that allows them to erect a mobile mast prior to obtaining planning permission, because it is used for emergency services. The operating companies abuse part of planning policy guidance note 8, which allows the erection of the masts under emergency powers. Effectively, that means applying for retrospective planning permission.

My constituents had every right to believe that, notwithstanding emergency powers, the application would eventually be turned down. Public meetings were held, concerns were raised and petitions were presented. The community and parents of the Baltimore road area had the support of the Labour councillor, who did not want the potential health hazard and visual eyesore on their doorstep. They had my support, because I did not want a mobile phone mast on the doorstep of schoolchildren. They had the support of the Labour Administration, who rightly turned down the application. Finally, the community and parents of Baltimore road were supported by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister, who dismissed a subsequent appeal from Airwave mmO$_2$.

All that was in vain, however, because on 7 October, almost a year to the date on which the Tetra mast was erected, planning permission was granted. In the end, a valiant and emotional campaign that put the quality of life of the community on the front line of planning ended in betrayal, when the Liberal-Conservative coalition granted planning permission for the mast.

How can that have happened? That 15 m tower is just one of many needed for the West Midlands police new multi-million pound Tetra radio system, which relies on mobile phone technology instead of radio frequencies. Although the new system promises to be a far more efficient way for police officers to communicate than their current outdated system, the installation of the mast has sparked controversy.

It is claimed that the new installations are being made under emergency powers. Those emergency powers allow the operators to install and use the equipment for up to six months, while they apply for planning permission and make any necessary subsequent appeals to my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and his planning inspectorate. That is a complete misuse of the planning guidance, of which I hope my hon. Friend the Minister will take note and act on with the telecoms industry. Indeed, one of the recommendations of an inquiry recently held by the all-party group on mobile communications was that the Government should investigate the ways in which emergency provisions can prevail. The inquiry suggests more stringent regulations on what constitutes an emergency, with suitable penalties for operators who do not comply with such procedures.

There is nothing intrinsically wrong with wanting to provide an emergency service with a digital radio system. Such a system promises improved local and inter-service communications, with better signal quality and high reliability. I am not against our police having the best tools to beat the criminals, particularly if we are to maintain and improve on the reduced crime figures in the area. However, in my constituency, the governors of a 700-pupil school and the Labour team, along with the residents and the parents, are worried about the possible health risks—the mast is only 300 m from Dorrington school. More concerning is the close proximity of residential properties that are fewer than 100 m away.

The Stewart report—the independent study carried out in May 2001—found that the possibility of harm could not be ruled out. It suggested that a precautionary approach should be adopted.

Mr. Mohammad Sarwar (Glasgow, Govan) (Lab): My hon. Friend will be aware of various studies that have been undertaken to establish whether such masts pose an increased threat of cancer and other illnesses. As yet, the evidence has not been conclusive. Rightly, the parents of schoolchildren, and people in residential areas, are extremely concerned about the health hazards. Should the Government not have a national strategy to deal with this serious issue?

Mr. Mahmood: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. I totally agree that more work needs to be done. In order to allay residents' fears, it is important that we undertake such studies, and on health grounds we must ensure that the issues are dealt with properly. The Trade and Industry Committee reported that it was > "disturbed at the lack of examination of the potentially adverse health effects of the masts."

Mr. Siôn Simon (Birmingham, Erdington) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that, regardless of the health impact or otherwise of the devices, we have a consultative framework for planning legislation in this country so that ordinary people who live in an affected area have a right not just to be consulted but to have a say as to whether they have such things at the end of their gardens? They have a right to say, "OK, build it, by all means, but we do not want it dumped at the end of our road."

Mr. Mahmood: I thank my hon. Friend. He is right about consultation. One of the things about this escapade is that there has been very little consultation with residents, and one of the residents' reasons for being totally against the mast is that it was put up before any of them had been informed about the process. The complete lack of consultation with the residents of the Baltimore road area has done nothing to stem their fears that something is being hidden from them, and that is creating some distress in the community. Surely, Airwave mmO$_2$ could have relocated the mast to one of several more suitable industrial sites, away from residential properties and Dorrington school. It could still do so, but it has chosen not to.

One of the recommendations of the all-party group on mobile communications is that, in their development plans, local planning authorities lay down policies and guidance on the siting, design and appearance of telecommunications installations. The group aims to build confidence in the community, involving people in the decision-making process, suggesting a more rigorous approach to the allocation of sites, and throwing the book at communications companies that bend the rules to suit themselves and do not consult local people, as my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Simon) has said.

My constituents were let down by the Liberals and Conservatives, who gave mmO$_2$ a helping hand to erect a mobile phone mast on Baltimore road. The residents of that area cannot comprehend why the mast has been granted planning approval despite the application's having been refused by the previous planning committee, and a subsequent appeal to the Secretary of State having been lost.

Sadly, the residents were led to believe by a local Liberal councillor that a legal challenge to the decision of the local planning authority was possible. However, even he has now confessed to me by e-mail that his advice was not practical or viable, because of the expense of a judicial review. He is a person who, when challenged by me at a Perry Barr ward committee meeting about whether he supported the residents of the Baltimore road area or the Liberal parliamentary candidate for the neighbouring Birmingham, Hodge Hill constituency—fondly known as "Nokia Davies"—who worked for the telecoms industry installing phone masts, gave his categorical reply that he supported the Liberal candidate and hence not the residents of Perry Barr. What my residents need is constructive advice from their local elected representatives and not crocodile tears with no achievable end.

Clearly the jury is still out on the health risks, and clearly the unsightly and potentially harmful masts should be subject to increased public consultation not only on their siting and appearance but on health grounds. I hope that my hon. Friend will provide a constructive way forward for us to deal with unscrupulous telecoms mast operators. I urge him to refer to all the recommendations made by the all-party mobile communications group and, more importantly, to include health grounds as a planning issue when applications for masts are submitted. The only way that I can help my constituents now is by giving my support in complaining to the local government ombudsman about how the development control committee has dealt with the issue.

I urge my hon. Friend to consider all grounds in planning regulations—I am sure that he will—and particularly those relating to health. As my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sarwar) has said, that should cover the health studies that need to be carried out, and as my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington has noted, the people who want to install the masts should hold proper consultations so that communities can be informed of issues pertaining to them. We have to look for the best possible sites. It is no good companies putting up masts under emergency powers on the first available site without any consultation and then applying for retrospective planning permission.

I say again that the only way for me to help my constituents is to contact the local government ombudsman about the shabby way that the local government planning committee has dealt with my residents in the Baltimore road area. I hope that my hon. Friend will have something to add to that.

3.42 pm

Paul Clark (Gillingham) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Mahmood) on securing this debate and on raising what are important concerns for his constituents and every Member of Parliament. I have no doubt that we have all received correspondence on similar issues. I also thank my hon. Friends the Members for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sarwar) and for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Simon) for their contributions. This is an important debate, and the concerns that they raised are shared by many of our constituents and us as Members.

I will start by explaining where we are vis-à-vis the case in question and the Airwave programme, looking at some of the possibilities, and emphasising the importance that the Government place on health issues and related matters—I know that they are of particular concern.

The debate relates to Tetra, which stands for terrestrial trunked radio and is a standard for digital private mobile radio. Tetra is a European standard agreed in the 1990s by the European Telecommunications Standards Institute. There is no "Tetra project" as such—as I have said, it is a radio standard—so the police are not the only organisation to use its technology.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr is right to say that Airwave mmO2 is currently rolling out a Tetra system on behalf of the Home Office for the police in England, Wales and Scotland. It uses the digital Tetra technology because it offers higher standards. Indeed, my hon. Friend alluded to the fact that it will undoubtedly improve matters for police officers and for the general public, and recognised that such a change was required in order to meet those goals.

The Tetra system will ensure that police forces throughout Great Britain can communicate directly with one another. They cannot do so with the old analogue systems, which are incompatible and do not provide sufficient coverage or clarity of signal. The new Tetra system will provide that coverage and clarity. It will also provide additional services that are not currently available: not only does it offer better security, but data other than normal voice communications can be transmitted.

The roll-out of Airwave is progressing well. It is currently available to 40 forces and about 78,000 police users. The Government expect it to be available to all forces by mid-2005 and that it will be fully operational by mid-2006. About 80 per cent. of the 3,000 masts required for Airwave to provide a national service have been approved without causing untoward circumstances. Obviously, further masts may be a problem—the one referred to by my hon. Friend at Baltimore road is one such—but they will be few and far between.

Mr. Simon: I have no doubt that the Minister will come to this matter in a moment, but such masts cannot be that few or that far between. In my constituency of Erdington, which is next door to that of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr, people have come to me during the past year having woken up one morning to discover a huge, loud, dirty and ugly mobile phone mast at the bottom of their garden. Such masts have no planning permission; they do not require it, because they are apparently temporary structures—although, lo and behold, they never go away. It cannot happen that rarely; if it is happening in my constituency and in that of my hon. Friend, it must be happening all over the place. People are furious, not about the principle of masts or the health implications but about the fact that these things suddenly appear the bottom of the garden—and they have no say in the matter.

Paul Clark: I thank my hon. Friend for that. I was specifically talking about the masts required to allow the roll-out of the Tetra system, not mobile phone masts per se. I recognise what my hon. Friend says, but as I said in my introductory remarks, we will all have faced problems over communications masts—it may be clearer if I put it that way. Certainly, as far as the Tetra roll-out is concerned, the vast majority have gone through okay, but some have caused problems, one of those obviously being the one that we are discussing now.

I understand that the mast at Baltimore road is necessary to help complete the network for the West Midlands police force, which adopted the Airwave network earlier this year. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is aware that at some key sites it has been necessary for Airwave to install communications equipment and to seek planning approval retrospectively. We are well aware of that; I shall deal with the question a little later. The company had to do that in order to ensure complete radio coverage of the area with no black holes, otherwise the local police forces would be unable to transfer to the enhanced communications network as planned.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr clearly explained that the development control committee of Birmingham city council was initially minded to reject the application for the Baltimore road development on potential health grounds. The equipment was perceived as a risk to the health of residents and to that of children attending the nearby school, to which my hon. Friend referred. On 7 October, the development control committee considered a full planning permission application, and was minded to approve it.

There was a possibility that enforcement action towards the removal of the mast could have been taken at the stage to which my hon. Friend referred, but it was held in abeyance until the outcome of the application, which was considered on 7 October. As my hon. Friend is aware, it is normal practice for a local authority to hold certain actions in abeyance until various stages have been completed and followed through to exhaustion, and then to use enforcement if required. Having said that, there are ways to challenge that decision and my hon. Friend is minded to support consideration by the local government ombudsman of maladministration if a matter has been handled incorrectly by the planning authority or if someone feels that they have suffered an injustice in the processes followed.

I would advise my hon. Friend again to exhaust all procedures with the local authorities to give them a chance to rectify the situation before taking things to the next stage. That is common sense, and I am sure he is aware of that. The Government give responsibility to local planning authorities, which are closer to the ground, to take decisions about local communities and local planning applications.

Mr. Mahmood: Would the Government support whatever decisions were taken by the local planning authorities?

Paul Clark: I am coming to the local planning authorities' options. At certain stages, the Government and my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister can be involved. We have laid down a system that ensures that there are procedures to be followed in dealing with these matters. On planning regulations, especially for telecommunications developments, any installation that is in a designated area—such as an area of outstanding natural beauty or an SSSI—or one elsewhere that is more than 15 m high, is the subject of a full planning application. Outside the designated areas that I mentioned, licensed communication code system operators are authorised under the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995 to install specified communications apparatus without the need to make a planning application to the local authority. Certain types of development, however, such as the installation of ground-based masts of up to 15 m in height, are subject to a prior approval procedure, which allows the local planning authority the opportunity to say whether it wishes to approve details of the siting or appearance of the installation.

However, it is for the local planning authority to decide whether a particular development would require an application for prior approval or a full planning application, and it would have to decide in the light of local development plan policies and any other material considerations, including representations for and against any specific application.

A number of options are open to local authorities in terms of enforcement, and it is a matter for the local authority to decide what is the best course of action in the light of the issue it is dealing with. That is the broad line along which we expect local authorities to operate.

Mr. Sarwar: I appreciate that the matter is for the local authority to decide, but it is a national issue, not a regional one, and parents and others in all parts of the United Kingdom are rightly concerned, especially when there is professional advice that mobile use by individuals affects health and increases the risk of cancer and other illnesses. Should there not be some national strategy to allay people's fears?

Paul Clark: I recognise what my hon. Friend is saying about the health issue, and I will come to that. There is a national issue, but a Government can only lay down a framework of options and processes for planning applications, and local authorities will then make a judgment. I will come on to health because it is a serious issue of concern to many.

I want to deal now with the enforcement powers open to local authorities. First, there is the operation to serve a planning contravention notice. That may be used where it appears that there has been a breach of planning control, and the local planning authority requires information about activities on the land. Secondly, authorities have the option of serving an enforcement notice, which my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr referred to and which requires steps to be taken to remedy the breach within a given period of time. There is a right of appeal to the Secretary of State against an enforcement notice, but there is a maximum penalty of £20,000 if it is upheld on conviction.

Thirdly, authorities have the power to serve a stop notice, which has the effect of immediately stopping any activity that contravenes the planning control guidelines. Fourthly, they have the power to serve a breach of condition notice where there is a failure to comply with any condition or limitation imposed on the granting of planning permission. Fifthly, an injunction can be sought through the High Court or the county court, which would restrain any actual or expected breach of planning control. Finally, local authority planning officers have powers of entry on to land to gain the information that they require to assess what is going on and to undertake the enforcement process. Local authorities, whatever the planning application or the activity that has gone on, have a wide range of powers open to them.

There are emergency development powers. There is no specific definition under the orders on general permitted development as to what emergency works are, but one is contained in the planning policy guidance note 8, on telecommunications. Emergency developments are various > "works the execution of which at the time it is proposed to execute them is requisite in order to put an end to, or prevent, the arising of circumstances then existing or imminent which are likely to cause"

> "danger to persons or property," or

> "the interruption of any service provided by the operator's system or . . . substantial loss to the operator".

Mr. Mahmood: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Paul Clark: I will not, as I have given way a number of times and I am conscious that I want to say a number of things to respond to hon. Members' concerns.

We take health concerns seriously, as we would be expected to. The Home Office has requested the National Radiological Protection Board to consider the issues of possible health effects caused by Tetra base stations. That was comprehensively addressed in a report by the board's independent advisory group on non-ionising radiation, chaired by Sir Richard Doll. That report, which is available on the board's website, noted that the signals from Tetra base stations, like their mobile phone counterparts, are not pulsed—there was concern that they are.

A number of steps have been taken, and the emissions from base stations under Tetra are well within international guidelines. I assure hon. Members that we continue to review the work of and to work with the industry and independent organisations to consider the possibilities on the health side, including the excellent work undertaken by the all-party parliamentary mobile communications group, some of which has been mentioned. We have undertaken to review the group's recommendations in taking forward our policies on planning for telecommunications.

Time defeats us, but I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr on securing this debate on an issue that is important, not only for his constituents but for us all. The Government are conscious of the concerns raised by hon. Members.

Housing (Brent)

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD): It is a great pleasure to have secured this debate to raise important issues concerning housing in Brent. Access to housing and overcrowding are the No. [illegible] issues in my constituency. Of course, the issues surrounding that of housing in Brent are wide and could fill perhaps a dozen Adjournment debates; perhaps the House will allow me to raise those issues on other occasions. Today, I will confine my words to issues of access, overcrowding, and supply and demand across the sector, but with specific reference to the impact on social housing.

In common with much of inner London, Brent is an area of mixed economies, with varied wages and living standards. The average wage in Brent is about £25,000 a year, which is lower than the London average of about £33,000, but about the same as the UK average. However, that number masks huge variations. Unemployment is running at the 23rd highest of any constituency in the country, and 31 per cent. of children in my constituency are eligible for free school meals—I am sure that hon. Members will agree that that is a very high figure. The Audit Commission said that Brent is an area of significant deprivation, and the 13th most deprived London borough. Against that background, Brent has some of the highest property prices in London—in Brondesbury and Queen's Park—and has consistently been among the boroughs with the fastest rising house prices in London.

Rents are similarly high, which probably explains why so many people live in house shares. Brent is thought to have the highest level of houses in multiple occupation—HMOs—anywhere in the country. According to figures from the Brent private tenants rights group, one in 20 of unfit HMOs in England and Wales is in Brent. That extraordinary and shocking figure is borne out by my experience of constituents coming to my surgeries to complain about overcrowded bedsits, into which large families are packed, with poor escape routes and the concomitant fire risks.

Such pressures on the housing market and rented accommodation put increased pressure on the social housing sector. There are 2,076 applications on the housing transfer list in Brent—those are applications from Brent tenants who are waiting for transfers, and may well involve entire families—but there are 17,151 applications on the total register list, which includes everyone else, totalling 19,227 applications to move, as of September. That has risen by 40 per cent. in 18 months.

The ethnic breakdown of people on the housing waiting lists in Brent is as follows: 40 per cent. are black, compared with 20 per cent. of the Brent population; 19 per cent. are white, compared with 45 per cent. of the Brent population; 18 per cent. are Asian; and 6.5 per cent. are of mixed or other race. So, the problem disproportionately affects black residents in my constituency.

Brent expected the overall waiting list to reach 20,000 by 2006, but it will almost certainly reach it by 2005. However, lettings by Brent authority have declined to a 15-year low; it expects to be able to let properties to fewer than 7 per cent. of current applicants in 2004–05.

[Sarah Teather]

The Brent housing needs survey, which is compiled from a mix of census and sampling data and which looks at all the properties in the borough, whether inhabited by homeowners or tenants, found that 10.6 per cent. of households are overcrowded. That figure rises to 16 per cent. of local authority and registered social landlord homes, as compared with 2.4 per cent. of all English households.

Some 35 per cent. of those on the housing register are overcrowded. The 2001 census figures showed that Brent has the fourth highest level of overcrowding in London. Overcrowding disproportionately affects people from immigrant and ethnic minority families, as they tend to have larger families and because there is a chronic shortage of larger properties in the borough.

The impact of overcrowding and the sense of hopelessness about moving have an enormous impact on families. Week after week I hear the same heart-rending stories in my surgery, and it is to my immense frustration that there is often little or nothing that I can do to help. In almost every surgery the same story is told: a family of four has been on the waiting list for a number of years, and usually one or both parents are on anti-depressants as a result. The parents have mood swings and are often angry and lash out. The children have asthma caused from the damp in the property. The family have letters from their GP and the school stating that illness is affecting the child's ability to thrive and their academic standards. It is all because of the way they are living. The family have no sense of hope that they may be able to move.

The costs of treating the illness and the costs to society of children who are less well educated and of adults who are economically unproductive are obvious. It is an awful injustice when so much potential goes to waste. That story is repeated week in and week out. There is no more pressing injustice in my constituency. I want to tell a few of the stories.

Siobhan McCutcheon and her partner, Mr. Cottle are housing association tenants with three children who live in a tiny, two-bedroom flat in Willesden Green. The sitting room is very small; it is not big enough for a table. Their oldest child is too old now to share a room and the overcrowding is affecting his schoolwork. There is nowhere for him to do his homework because there is no table, so they have given him the small boxroom. However, there are two other children and the overcrowding problem has got worse as the family have got older.

The family have tried to make the best of it. The other two children are in the same room as their parents, but that is big enough only for a cot by the bed, so the three-and-a-half year old is in the cot. That child is the only one who will fit in a cot; the five-and-a-half-year-old is in the bed with the parents. That situation has been going on a long time. My representations to the housing association and the council have achieved nothing, because there is nowhere to move the family. The family are extremely angry and the mother is extremely depressed. I am sure that hon. Members would understand why and sympathise.

Another constituent who did not want to be named is also sharing a bed with one of her children. She has sickle cell disease, which at times causes her extreme pain and chronic problems with her hip. She cannot turn over in bed for fear of rolling on to her baby. Her other three children share a single room.

Mrs. Alderson and Mr. James live in a three-bedroom maisonette where there are eight people. The baby shares the bed with the parents and the two-year-old is in the same room. Their teenager, who has exams and is trying to get on with schoolwork, is in the boxroom. The other three children share one room. My representations on behalf of the family have brought them higher priority but no new home.

The story is similar for temporary accommodation. Brent spent £6 million on temporary accommodation in 2003–04. That covered both accommodation costs and housing benefit subsidy. It had 4,238 households in temporary accommodation in March 2004. It met the Government's target for reducing the number of people in temporary accommodation, but an awful lot remain. A recent Shelter survey of homeless households in temporary accommodation showed very similar effects of living in overcrowding to those that I have described.

In the survey, 78 per cent. said that they had health problems, 50 per cent. were suffering from depression and 50 per cent. said that their health had suffered from living in temporary accommodation. Children missed an average of 55 school days because of disruption caused by temporary accommodation. Two thirds of respondents' children said that they had problems at school. Nearly half the respondents described their children as "often unhappy or depressed". In 77 per cent. of those households there was no family member working, often because of health or mobility problems and insecurity about where they were living.

On the basis of a comparison of those needs, Shelter estimated that the additional annual cost to the public purse associated with temporary accommodation is about £500 million. That includes not only housing benefit expenditure and take-up of income support, but the result of missed school, additional take-up of sickness benefit and additional visits to GPs.The cost is huge.

Against that background, Brent council has introduced Locata, which is a choice-based letting system. There are four bands in the Locata system—A to D, defining a homeseeker's priority. Locata, not the local authority, manages the allocation of property for each homeseeker. There are five steps to inclusion on the Locata scheme. First, one must become a member, which is automatic for local authority tenants and homeseekers. Once someone is a member, they are given a number defining their banding and their priority date—the date that they registered. They then check a fortnightly "freesheet" that lists properties. Those must be picked up from libraries, but for a small fee they can be sent out. They are free to the infirm.

Members can bid for any property for which they are eligible. The sheet is issued every other Friday and bids must be received by the following Wednesday. Bids can be sent by coupon for the cost of a stamp, by text for the cost of a text, by telephone at 25p per minute, or on the web, which is the cost of a dial-up—so tenants now pay to be rehoused.

Locata allocates the bids in priority order, and puts them on a shortlist that goes to the landlord. Therefore, if lots of band C members bid for a property, the one with the most points—based on the usual criteria of waiting time and overcrowding—wins. The successful bidder is told that they have won; others have to look at subsequent "freesheets" to find out.

In this week's "freesheet" there are 29 non-sheltered accommodation properties available for Brent residents: two studio flats, 13 one-bed flats, 10 two-bed flats, one three-bed house and three four-bed homes. Hon. Members may recall that earlier in my speech I gave the number of people who were waiting to be transferred—just over 19,000. That housing will not go very far.

The housing stock in north-west London has not increased by virtue of the system; there is still chronic need. Those who were considered a priority before and were thus almost the only ones who were likely to move, are still a higher priority and more eligible. However, they, rather than the local authority, now have to look actively for properties every week. If they do not bid, they will not get rehoused. No guidance is given to people on what properties they can realistically bid for. The only benefits of the system are that void properties can be let more quickly and that there is now no penalty for refusing a property. Other than that, the system is merely an elaborate scheme to change the way in which people are let down by the lack of housing.

I am not against choice, but I am against lack of real choice and false choice—the residents are led to believe that they have a choice and that they will get a new home through this system. They get a glossy magazine through the post and think, "Great, look at all these properties I can bid for." Then, if they are a larger family, they find that there are no properties that they can bid for, and that the chances of their being rehoused are almost nil. That is not explained to people.

I spoke to Lorraine King from one of the local papers—the Willesden & Brent Chronicle—who sees many people in a similar situation to those whom I see. Such people are right at the end of the road; they have run out of options. She explained her frustration that people often cannot manage the system because they are disabled or because they cannot read. They do not realise that they are falling through the net.

One option is to get more people into the private rented market, but there is a huge problem in persuading people to consider that. The reasons for that unwillingness are both cultural and pragmatic. Brent takes 34 days to process changes in circumstances for housing benefit; its tenants have the fourth longest wait in London. It also has the lowest percentage in London of new claims processed within 14 days. Many landlords, therefore, are not willing to work with the sector.

Brent has a rental deposit scheme. That is good, but the loan under the scheme is only £500. For a large family, that loan is not enough to get a new property—it will not go very far. Brent also has a private housing unit, which holds people's hands, takes them through the system and tries to explain what it means to rent privately. However, all too often, when the introductions are made, the private landlords say, "No, I won't take you on housing benefit", despite the fact that they are on the list for the council. We need to do much more to encourage people to rent privately. A better loan system is needed, but housing benefit must also be processed much more quickly, and more action must be taken to tackle unscrupulous landlords.

Many of the provisions introduced by and accepted when considering the Housing Bill are welcome. I was disappointed, however, that licensing was not extended to include two-storey properties. There are many bedsits in my constituency that fall into that category.

The real problem is lack of supply. Brent has one of the highest rates of empty properties in London, at 5.4 per cent. of private sector and 3.7 per cent. of public sector dwellings. I was pleased that some of the Liberal Democrats' recommendations were incorporated into the Housing Bill, such as provision for empty property management orders. We would also require local authorities to maintain a register of empty properties in their area, and Whitehall departments to audit their properties annually and report on that to Select Committees.

However, we also need more houses to be built. The Mayor's office estimated that 23,000 homes needed to be built in London annually, and that 10,000 of which should be affordable. I know that money has been invested in the decent homes initiative and into the new deal in my constituency, but neither of those initiatives tackles the problem of supply. They improve the quality, but not the total supply. That is the most important issue. We need to examine other areas for building.

Finally, I ask the Government to make public what land is publicly owned and underused. I ask the Minister to consider making Brent a pilot project—to survey all public sector holdings, be they in education, the NHS, local authority or ex-publicly owned, so that they could be made available either to sell off, ploughing the receipts back into social and affordable housing, or so that money for affordable housing could be gained through section 106 agreements. It is no good Departments sitting on publicly owned land and speculating about its future land value. The crisis affecting my constituents is here and now and needs an urgent solution.

The costs of the crisis are felt elsewhere in the public sector. I refer to high rents for temporary accommodation, and to mental and physical health problems. A decision to make the existence of the land public knowledge and to sell it off would require leadership, but that is no more than my constituents deserve.

4.15 pm

Paul Clark (Gillingham) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) on securing this debate on what is undoubtedly an important issue not only to her constituents but to all of us where there are the pressures and the combination of factors that she described. She explained how they come together in particularly large numbers in Brent, East, and I shall come to that in a moment.

The long-term solution to the problem is to increase supply. The hon. Lady will be well aware that the sustainable communities ethos of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is about providing increased supply where we need it; about quality, better use of land, and design to a decent standard where there are pressures such as in Brent, East; and about bringing areas of low demand and abandonment back into use and making them more attractive. As with many of these issues, as I am sure she is aware, there is no single straightforward solution to all the problems that we face throughout the country.

I shall now deal specifically with Brent. The hon. Lady knows well that it is ethnically a very diverse borough of London. In fact, it is one of only two boroughs where the ethnic minority groups together make up the majority in the area. That diversity is having a positive effect on community cohesion and regeneration in Brent.

I am well aware of the hon. Lady's history of raising issues such as house prices, empty homes in her constituency and the waiting list for housing, which she graphically described today. The Government share those concerns and are committed not only to reducing significantly the number of those in temporary accommodation but to raising the standard of homes, because that is the other side of the coin. We must not only increase the supply of additional properties but consider those properties that already exist. If I am correct, some 29 per cent. of dwellings in Brent, East are termed unsuitable for accommodation. Clearly, that situation is not acceptable, and some of the projects to which the hon. Lady referred are helping to address it. Indeed, much of the money going into her constituency and Brent as a whole is focused on housing issues rather than other matters.

The Brent housing partnership, the arm's-length management organisation, is one of only six in the country to have been rated as excellent by the Audit Commission. That partnership has been awarded £68 million for the period from 2003 to 2007 to improve housing stock, and is on course to meet the decent homes target. I am sure that the hon. Lady is aware that when the Government came to office seven years ago, there was a £19 billion backlog in repairs and refurbishments required of the housing stock. We set a target, which is to have those completed by 2010, and we are well on the way to meeting it. Equally, Brent is well on the way to achieving its decent homes standards.

As the hon. Lady said, we have begun to spend substantial sums in Brent, but we recognise that spending is not the only requirement. We are talking about a population of more than 250,000 living in approximately 104,000 households. The majority of those dwellings—63 per cent.—are owner-occupied, 13 per cent. are privately rented, 12 per cent. have registered social landlords, and only 10 per cent. are directly managed by Brent council. A number of wards in Brent, such as Brentwater, Wembley Central, Sudbury and Preston are in the top 5 per cent. of the most housing-deprived wards in the country. The housing in those wards is predominantly owner-occupied. It is estimated that to bring all non-local authority housing up to standard would cost some £7.7 billion. That is an indication of the size of the problem that faces those of us concerned with housing and living conditions across the country.

Other issues complicate the situation in Brent. For example, a large number of families require units of three or more bedrooms. That is an added factor that is different from the norm that we might find elsewhere.

Sarah Teather: That point in particular is a grave concern, because many families of Asian background tend to be larger. There is a sense that the lack of larger properties discriminates against larger families of Asian origin.

Paul Clark: The hon. Lady makes a valid point. The ethnicity of the area of Brent is beginning to help find some solutions. As I was going on to say, Brent council, along with its partners, has made housing and regeneration a policy and is good at forming partnerships with all sectors. That is fundamentally important, because if we are to meet needs in areas such as the hon. Lady's constituency, we need lasting sustainable solutions that come about not only in conjunction with local authorities and national Government, but with the constituent parts in a given area, such as the community with all its different facets. That is how to start addressing the specific problems of a given area.

One of the major leaders for regeneration in Brent is the local strategic partnership, "Partners for Brent." It has been allocated some £9.5 million-worth of neighbourhood renewal funding for the areas of St. Raphael's, Stonebridge, Harlesden, Church End and Roundwood. It has also determined that regeneration of Wembley associated with the national stadium should deliver housing supply for Brent. When I looked through the Brent regeneration action plan for 2004 to 2006, I noted that it stated that the regeneration at Wembley must deliver for local people as well as providing a national stadium.

The hon. Lady raised the issues of unemployment, jobs, skills and so on. We must address those issues through skills training for the jobs that exist and for new jobs to come. I recently attended a launch of a skills audit for my area, which examined where there are skills gaps, how we can plug them, and what we need to do to deliver training and support for local people. The Brent regeneration action plan also raises that point. That will help in the cycle of welfare and good living as well as in housing.

Another example of where moneys are going to start addressing the housing problems that the hon. Lady referred to is the housing action trust, which is based on the single neighbourhood that makes up Carlton ward. It involves the complete demolition of the Stonebridge estate and the provision of about 1,500 new homes, together with residual land for additional homes. That comprehensive programme of community development shows that the Government take seriously the concerns that have been raised in this debate.

Sarah Teather: I should make the Minister aware that none of the areas that he has so far described are in my constituency; Wembley, Stonebridge and Harlesden are all outside it. However, that is not to say that the change will not have a knock-on effect on supply in Brent as a whole. The point about the new deal for communities and the regeneration work that is taking place, particularly in south Kilburn, is that there will be no net increase in social housing units. However, there will be no net loss, which is a tribute to the work of that new deal.

Paul Clark: I thank the hon. Lady for that comment. People's housing demands and needs do not just reflect the arbitrary boundaries of the parliamentary constituencies that are drawn up by the boundary commission. One must consider the matter holistically, as I am sure she is aware.

Equally, the issue is not just about building new units. As I said at the outset, in the long-term, the goal is to increase supply, which may not be directly available in the hon. Lady's constituency. Certain sites may be coming—I am aware that some have been flagged up as possibilities—but the problem is getting together the mix to make things work. The aim is also to bring the nearly 30 per cent. of the existing housing stock up to a decent standard, so that those who live in it can have a standard that is acceptable for the 21st century.

On the housing action trust, we have also committed another £165 million over 10 years. Through that trust, additional homes will, I understand, come through. The process will involve removing the existing homes but rebuilding and providing refurbished homes for the secure tenants by 2007, and will also bring on stream some additional properties.

The hon. Lady referred to the new deal for communities in south Kilburn, where £50 million has been allocated over 10 years. The residents there identified housing as their key priority at the outset of the programme. They are on the cusp of an exciting programme that will turn what I understand to be one housing estate back into four high-quality neighbourhoods, each with its own character and facilities. Some 1,500 of the existing properties will be demolished and rebuilt, an additional 1,400 homes will be provided for private sale and 775 existing homes will be retained and refurbished. That will go some way to address some of the concerns that have been raised.

We are well aware that 73 per cent. of households in south Kilburn live in council-rented accommodation. That is why the bulk of the funding is targeted at housing projects. Not only are we putting in a substantial amount of money, but the introduction of other money will lead to a total of £630 million being given to the project. That is important to get things moving.

The hon. Lady referred to a number of other issues. I am pleased that she welcomes the developments in the Housing Bill, and she is right about the empty property management orders, which hopefully will be on the statute book before the end of this year. On overcrowding, the new housing health and safety rating system should help, with a fitness standard for housing, as should the licensing of houses in multiple occupation.

Those are just some of the initiatives and moneys that are going in. We recognise the frustration that families and communities in the hon. Lady's constituency suffer, as we do for other parts of the country. The investment in housing is high on the political agenda and the hon. Lady recognises that. We are putting money into the areas where it is most needed. Brent, East is one of those areas, as is Brent itself. We continue to monitor, to see that that money is used well and effectively for the benefit of her constituents.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Four o'clock.

Greater Manchester Metrolink

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Margaret Moran.]

9.30 am

Ian Stewart (Eccles) (Lab): I am pleased to have secured this Adjournment debate at the first time of asking, as the subject is a top priority for all hon. Members in the Greater Manchester area. A number of them want to speak today, so I shall try to confine my remarks accordingly. However, I intend to take some time to give an overview of the problem, in the hope that that will leave hon. Members time to make their remarks in a more pointed way.

The Metrolink tram system is an on-road technology that can also run on heavy railtracks. The Greater Manchester passenger transport executive, which has responsibility for buses, trains and light rail systems—trams—across Greater Manchester, introduced a phase 1 line from Bury to Altrincham in 1991. That was followed by a phase 2 line from Manchester city centre to my constituency of Eccles in 1998. This successful and viable system has been acknowledged as a positive model for the rest of the country.

Since the Government announced in July 2004 that phase 3 of the Metrolink was, in effect, being put on ice, there has been a flurry of meetings, campaigns, petitions, posters, videos and letters to the official broadly based "Get our Metrolink back on track" campaign, which is supported vociferously by the Manchester Evening News, the Salford Advertiser and other local media. On 23 September, a high-level delegation from Greater Manchester brought more than 41,500 messages of support for the campaign to be handed in at No. 10 Downing street.

Ministers have been very willing to hear our representations. I thank the Minister who is here today, Tony McNulty, the Secretary of State for Transport, Alistair Darling, and the Prime Minister for meeting delegations of Greater Manchester MPs to explore ways in which we can move forward to secure the Metrolink investment that we all want. Following those meetings, the Department for Transport set up a working party with the Greater Manchester PTE. The Minister and Keith Bradley MP are involved in seeking a viable solution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must call hon. Members' attention to the practice that we employ in these august surroundings. They should refer to colleagues by constituency rather than by name. I hope that hon. Members will follow the correct practice from now on.

Ian Stewart: Thank you for your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was, of course, referring to my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley).

As I said, following the meetings, a working party was set up. I stress that the purpose of this debate, from my point of view, is to place the problem in context, not to try to take the place of the working party. However, I am clear that progress can and must be made in concluding a viable settlement, not only because of the overwhelming public support for the Metrolink in Greater Manchester, but because concluding such a settlement would be good value for money, environmentally sound and the sensible thing to do for the good of the conurbation and, indeed, the whole north-west.

In my constituency, I recently held a "big conversation" meeting on the Metrolink, at which large and small businesses and voluntary organisations came together to express support for the Metrolink extensions. In Greater Manchester as a whole, the Manchester chamber of commerce, the Transport and General Workers Union, of which I am a proud member, and Unison are all firm supporters of Metrolink phase 3. At regional level, the North West regional assembly and CBI North West have come out firmly behind phase 3. Indeed, CBI North West did not pull its punches when it said in a letter to the Prime Minister that its members

> "do not overemphasise the point when they say that withdrawal of the Government's support for Metrolink is a hammer blow to the confidence and prospects of Northern England."

Why is the rhetoric so strong and the passion so high? It could be argued that I do not have a direct interest in the matter, but I am delighted to say that Eccles and Salford were included in Metrolink phase 2. The Metrolink came to Eccles in 1998 and was opened by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I would like to outline in the words of my constituents and other commentators why the Metrolink is so popular. Alan Coates, from Life Opportunities Ltd., says:

> "We are a small organisation supporting people who have a disability in their own communities. The facility of having easily accessed transport from Eccles has greatly improved their opportunities for getting to other parts of their greater community. The promise of a much wider transport system held significant prospects for not only improved life experiences but also for a greater employment pool. In supporting people who have a disability we are also employers of some forty staff many of whom were previously unemployed. Salford still has numbers of people who are unemployed and a factor in them remaining so is access to efficient transport systems. Returning to work after being unemployed presents the individual with many challenges and availability of transport is often a deciding factor, this particularly so when the work is distant from their home e.g. to the airport."

D. J. Wilson wrote:

> "The impact of this decision may be limited now, but with the growth of the economy in the Greater Manchester area this impact will have far greater consequences in the future".

Andrew Bennett (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that one of the great successes of Greater Manchester has been the airport, through the jobs created there and in the surrounding area? However, we now have a situation where between 8 and 9 o'clock the vehicles using the motorways going south are slowed to a crawl because of the large number of people travelling to the airport. Is it not important that we have this link so that people can travel to the airport from the north of Manchester on the tram system, freeing up the motorways?

Ian Stewart: My hon. Friend is an experienced Member, and he is absolutely right. I will come on to some comments from the airport managing director later that confirm the points made by my hon. Friend.

A letter from two of my constituents, Leslie and Angela Wiseman, reads:

> "Having been a resident of Eccles for the past 25 years and a regular user of public transport the Metrolink was the best thing that happened to Eccles. The system is fast, efficient and pollution free and it is a disappointment that it is not to be extended to other parts of Greater Manchester. Journeys such as to and from Manchester Airport by Metrolink would be quicker, cheaper and easier."

Some of the small businesses in my constituency such as Smiths restaurant, an excellent restaurant in the centre of Eccles, have contacted me. Elaine McCann, Justin Critchley and David Hebden, who are partners in this business, wrote:

> "As partners in a small, but busy, restaurant in Eccles, we are in no doubt as to the amount of extra trade that the Metrolink brings to us and to other small businesses in the area. People coming into Eccles via the Metrolink are from not only our immediate neighbourhoods but also from more distant areas which can mean they're using more than one line and changing trams in order to get here. They seem more than happy to do this and an extension of the tram service can only mean that this, and other areas, will benefit from the injection of trade, business and works that such an extension would produce."

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): I am sorry to interrupt my hon. Friend in his listing of every letter from his constituents, but I am tempted to ask him whether he has found anyone against the Metrolink in Greater Manchester. I wanted to make a point consistent with what he has just said. Would he say a few words about the regeneration impact of the metro and the importance of those lines going out from east Manchester to Ashton, in relation to the advanced plans for the regeneration of our conurbation and its economy?

Ian Stewart: My hon. Friend is right, and he will hear me make some comment about the issues that he raises, but I shall leave the detail to my right hon. and hon. Friends from the constituencies concerned.

I will continue with a few more of the testimonies because it is right, as my hon. Friend has indicated, that every Member from Greater Manchester and beyond has a postbag that that could fill up the week's business of this place—rather than an hour and a half in Westminster Hall—in support of phase 3 of the Metrolink. Gerry Goodwin of Goodwin Machinery Ltd. writes:

> "Business property and homes have been purchased on the new links designated and you cannot let them down. As a staunch car user myself—when the South Manchester Line was started—I have used it at least twice a week to travel to Manchester and Bury."

John Spooner, the managing director of Manchester airport, writes:

> "Greater Manchester has been at the forefront of the delivery of integrated transport in a sustainable way . . . The existing Metrolink system has been a resounding success by any measure. It has therefore been an integral part of our transport strategy for many years. We have moved from being just supporters of the scheme to reserving valuable land for its construction and, in the last few years, directly investing over £60 million of our funds to build a new transport interchange. This involved over a million pounds in advance works and building a tunnel for the Metrolink extension . . .
> We have been investing in education, skills and training in local communities in readiness for the access to work that would flow from the construction of the Metrolink extension."

Geoff Muirhead CBE, who is the regional chairman of CBI in the north-west, is on record as stating:

> "Even taking into account these (additional) costs, I understand the scheme would still make a return on the investment required, even on the narrow basis used to assess its forecast performance. If the criteria were expanded to include benefits other than these related solely to transport, such as access to employment, social inclusion and enhanced land values, then the return on investment is vastly improved."

There is one final testimony that exemplifies some of the hidden demerits of the cancellation of the scheme. My hon. Friend the Deputy Leader of the House of Commons, the hon. Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth (Mr. Woolas), wrote to the Network Rail chief executive. I quote from the letter sent by the chief executive, John Armitt, in reply on 25 August 2004. He wrote:

> "Thank you for your letter dated 3 2004 August detailing your concerns over the decision to cancel the Metrolink project for Manchester, Oldham and Rochdale.
> The decision by the Rt. Hon. Alistair Darling MP, Secretary of State for Transport, to reverse the planned changes for the Network Rail-managed infrastructure"— that means the heavy rail infrastructure—

> "has naturally affected the budgetary constraints placed upon us by the Office for Rail Regulation.
> Until the decision by the Secretary of State, Network Rail had proceeded on the understanding that the Oldham loop would cease to be part of the heavy rail network from May 2005 and had not allocated funding to maintain it beyond this date. However, because we are required to maintain the rail network in its existing size and condition, this requirement is likely to extend to the Oldham loop if it is not to become part of the Metrolink network.
> The figure of £60 million is the Greater Manchester Passenger Transport Executive's own based on their own projected information. We do not concur that this figure is accurate and are currently undertaking our own detailed analysis of the various separate factors that would contribute to the cost of maintaining the Oldham loop as a heavy rail loop. These include: track condition" and so on. He continues:

> "Under the interim review of track access charges for the period 2004–9, our agreement with the Office for Rail Regulation for funding would not have included the operation, maintenance and renewal of the Oldham loop."

What I take from that correspondence is that the situation is not at a standstill. Even the figure of £60 million projected by the PTA is, in my understanding, an underestimate. Therefore, if the Metrolink phase 3 does not go ahead, Network Rail will have to find more than £60 million just to maintain the existing heavy rail route.

Tony Lloyd: This is an important point. I say to my hon. Friend and, through him, to the Minister that it is important that we get clarification on the matter. The existing heavy rail, or the light rail that would replace it, is an essential part of the transport infrastructure going out of the north of the city. The alternative to no Metrolink and no reinvestment in heavy rail is closure of that line. Will my hon. Friend make it absolutely clear that we need an answer about whether closure of the line is one possible outcome?

Ian Stewart: Absolutely. My hon. Friend has, as always, pointed to the important issues, and I would call for an answer to those questions. I understand that my hon. Friend the Minister will not be expected to answer today, but it is surely a matter for examination at a later stage.

We have anecdotal evidence of what Metrolink has achieved, but there is more rigorous evidence and analysis. In 2000, the Transport Sub-Committee of the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee produced a report on light rapid transport systems and detailed their benefits. It said that Greater Manchester Metrolink offered an attractive alternative to the car and could thus help to limit congestion and to reduce pollution, particularly when used with other traffic restraint methods.

More recently, the National Audit Office report on light rail systems pointed to the significant benefits to passengers. Although it was not as positive about other systems, it stated that the Greater Manchester system was successful and viable. Back in the 1980s, the PTA made a detailed analysis of transport requirements and concluded that the light rail option was best. My constituency, which is on the north side of the conurbation, has certainly benefited from phase 2.

Metrolink has, in the words of Greater Manchester PTA, been the cornerstone of Greater Manchester's public transport strategy for many years. Almost one fifth of the passengers using the first phase of Metrolink previously made their journey by car, and traffic volumes on the main radial routes into Manchester running parallel with the light rail system have fallen by between 2 and 8 per cent.

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the highest volumes of car traffic is in south Manchester running through my constituency? If the Chorlton to Didsbury spur were built, would the shifting of people out of their cars not have a dramatic impact on congestion and benefit the environment and people's health?

Ian Stewart: I am sure that my right hon. Friend is correct. I said that the figures fell between 2 and 8 per cent., and although such changes may appear small in absolute terms, they have had a significant impact on congestion on the roads affected. Each year, the three existing Metrolink lines carry 19 million passengers and take 3.8 million car trips off our roads. It is expected that the new extensions in phase 3, to which my right hon. Friend has referred, together with the expanded capacity of phase 1, will attract 50 million passengers a year and replace a further 5 million car trips.

My constituents have benefited from phase 2. Phase 3 is planned to serve a number of deprived areas with relatively high levels of unemployment in order to provide better access to potential places of work. It will boost regional competitiveness, assist the creation of sustainable communities and act as a catalyst for tens of thousands of new jobs. I am sure that my colleagues will elaborate on that in relation to their own constituencies.

Some solutions considered by other areas include the further use of guided or unguided buses. Buses have an important part to play in an integrated transport system. I have argued for bus re-regulation outside London and made many attempts to debate that important issue in Westminster Hall, so I was pleased when the Government announced the introduction of new powers that would enable Greater Manchester PTA to set up a bus-franchising operation, which would decide routes, timetables and fares. I am confident that the PTA will take up that challenge, but it is not a solution that should preclude the phase 3 Metrolink option. It should be done in conjunction with that, not as an alternative.

The Government recognised that when my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister announced in March 2000 that £250 million would be made available for the extension of Metrolink to Oldham, Rochdale, Manchester airport and Ashton-under-Lyne. As the Manchester Evening News campaigner of the day said, we then had our Metrolink for the millennium. All successive transport Ministers have been supportive of a phase 3 extension. At his speech to the CBI conference last year, the current Minister reported that the Government had more than doubled the funding available for local transport when he told the conference that

> "we've agreed funding of up to £520 million for the extension of the Manchester Metrolink."

On the basis of those commitments, Greater Manchester PTA has invested £200 million in buying and preparing land along the proposed routes of the three new lines. I acknowledge that the costs of the project have increased significantly because, it is argued, of high inflation in the construction sector and concerns about risks associated with light rail. When the Government made their announcement in July I acknowledged that costs could not continue to spiral, and although I was unhappy with his July statement I felt that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had left the door open for good, well-run metros such as Manchester to enter new negotiations and identify affordable extensions to their metro systems. I hope that the working party will do that, and find agreed solutions.

I am pleased that the Secretary of State is on record as saying that the Government are still supportive of the concept of rapid light transport systems and that this is an issue of cost and value for money. The statement is important because it allows me, as the MP for Eccles, to follow the vision that I and others have had for many years. I can call for future extensions of the Metrolink to the Barton strategic economic zone, where we hope that the Salford Reds rugby league club will be successful in building its new proposed stadium, and then for it to cross the Manchester ship canal to the Trafford centre. That would open a new transport facility for my constituents, and would also bring welcome regeneration investment to build on the existing investment that the Government have made in the Irlam and Cadishead bypass. I thank the Minister and the Department for approving that project.

[Ian Stewart]

I am sure that the Minister realises that the thrust of my contribution is that to make strategic sense, we need to come to an agreed solution on phase 3 so that we can then move on and grow a viable, value-for-money system in an integrated, appropriate and planned way.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Speaker is always anxious that everyone who wishes to contribute to these debates be accommodated, and I share that view. However, our business is time limited, as hon. Members know, and this debate terminates at 11 o'clock. I am required to call the first of the three Front-Bench spokesmen at 10.30, so we are left with 37 minutes for open debate. I see that four right hon. and hon. Members are seeking my eye, only three of whom have given prior notice. I appeal most earnestly to all of them to bear the time constraints in mind when making their speech, and when accepting or responding to interventions.

9.54 am

Mr. Graham Stringer (Manchester, Blackley) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Ian Stewart) on securing this debate. I can think of no more important issue to have affected the people of Greater Manchester in my 30 years of political activity there. No single issue has got through to so many people, and angered them, in the way that did the Secretary of State's decision not to approve Metrolink on 20 July.

I believe that that decision was fundamentally wrong, but I am extremely pleased that my hon. Friend the Minister of State is present. He has the difficult task of sorting the matter out. I certainly welcome his involvement in the working party. I support the attitude that he has taken to this as a problem to be solved.

It is not my intention to try to negotiate or to interfere with the negotiations in this debate. The debate is an important opportunity to go through the issues and to wish the working party success, but also to say in a non-minatory way that if the working party is not successful, the issue will not go away. The people of Greater Manchester, the local authorities there, the passenger transport authority, and beyond that, people in the north-west of England, will not let it go away.

My hon. Friend the Minister has a particularly difficult job because the Department, over the past year or two years, has not been as proactive as it could be. I am still concerned that when the costs of phase 3 of Metrolink escalated, from February 2004 until the statements on 20 July and indeed until meetings in September this year, there was no real activity from the Department to say, "Well, we know the figures are going up. They are going up for a number of reasons. How do we get this show back on the road?". The Department has viewed the future of Metrolink as a spectator sport, but it is not. It is vital that it happens and that the working party makes it happen.

I could spend as long as you would let me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, going through the history of this matter, but I do not want to do that. However, I want to put things in perspective. I am concerned that it makes the Minister's job more difficult when officials are saying that Ministers have "serious reservations" about light rail, at a time when the Minister and the Secretary of State are saying quite different things in public. That sort of thing undermines the process.

That is wholly consistent with the attitude that officials have taken to light rail in front of the Transport Committee. If the Minister would care to read question 54 in the record of the Transport Committee of 10 September last year, he will find that the Committee expressed extreme concern that officials from the Department were pressurising officials from the highways authority in Manchester and the PTA to invest in deregulated buses in direct competition to Metrolink along Cheetham Hill road and other parts of the Greater Manchester conurbation. That is not something that we would have expected from a Department that was seriously supportive of light rail. The Committee was also shocked to hear officials misrepresent statistics on the failure—they were pretending that it was a success—of deregulated buses in Greater Manchester and other conurbations.

When one is looking for alternatives to Metrolink—we are not, but if the Department is—a simple exercise in arithmetic will show that there simply is not the capacity in any feasible strategy to allow the numbers of passengers to be brought into the centre of Manchester and to other parts of the conurbation by bus. I do not like to quote the last Prime Minister but one, but there is no alternative to Metrolink if we want to move passengers round the Greater Manchester conurbation.

As the costs have escalated, black propaganda has been spread that the PTA was gold-plating phase 3 of Metrolink. I know of no gold-plating. The reasons for the costs of Metrolink rising are no great mystery. The world price of steel has risen and a lot of steel would be used in phase 3—that is not changeable. The cost of engineering work has risen because there is so much demand due to the success of the Government's economic policies. The businesses of light and heavy rail have become extremely risk averse, partly because of the fiasco surrounding the failure of Railtrack and the inception of Network Rail. Banks that fund light and heavy rail will no longer accept the risk. That is probably the largest factor in the increase of the costs of Metrolink.

There is no great mystery or evidence of gold-plating. If we want to get Metrolink back on track, the Government must accept the costs, as I hope they will because we cannot will them away. Changing the procurement method, as has been suggested on the Floor of the House, would not deliver what we want because re-tendering under a new process would effectively put Metrolink back three years. I remind right hon. and hon. Members that the procurement method of design, build and operate is supported and demanded by Government. It has never been favoured by the passenger transport authority or the passenger transport executive.

As far back as 1986–87, Lord Brooke of Sutton Mandeville, the then Under-Secretary of State for Transport, insisted, and it has been consistent Government policy since, on the method of design, build and operate, even though surveys, studies and independent consultants all showed that it was the most expensive option. That has always been the case, so it is not good enough for Government to say that they will consider different procurement methods. There is no mystery about why costs have risen; it is easily understood. The important thing is to find a way of working the finances so that the tram system gets back on track.

I shall finish with two final points. First, it is believed in Greater Manchester that the decision is symptomatic of a Government who do not understand the north-south divide. I agree with that, but I know that my hon. Friend the Minister of State does not. Let me put it in context. On the same day that Metrolink phase 3 was not approved, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport announced £2.9 billion extra funding for transport in London. That enabled Ken Livingstone to say to the Transport Committee that his real problem as Mayor of London was not a slight gap in the budget because of fewer cars paying the congestion charge, but that he could not spend the money that the Treasury gave him as fast as it gave it to him. No mayor or leader of a council anywhere else in the country could say that.

On that same day, as well as the £2.9 billion extra funding, it was agreed that £340 million would go towards the London Olympic bid. I wrote to the Minister of State and he wrote back on 6 September. I asked whether London would get that money if it does not win the Olympic bid and what sort of assessment has been made of the projects. The answer was that no assessment has been made because it is not known what transport projects will be paid for from that £340 million. There was no answer to whether London would keep the money if it does not win the bid to host the 2012 Olympic games. That is why I believe that the decision is an aspect of the north-south divide. The people of Greater Manchester are right to see it as such and the Government would be sensible to pay attention to them.

Finally, it is not just a case of saying that the Government got one decision wrong among the many that they get right. The decision is fundamental to the regional competitiveness of Manchester, Greater Manchester and the north-west. Most of the documents coming out of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister rightly make that point. If we want to do something about the north-south divide, there must be investment to make the north, the north-west and Manchester more competitive. This decision will make the area less competitive and will lead to the Government's failure to fulfil their commitment to reduce the difference between rates of growth in the north and the south of England.

One could say the same about housing market renewal projects in Oldham, in my constituency and elsewhere that are close to tramlines. The areas in which efforts will be made to put right the market failure have been determined partly by the availability of Metrolink, as have several investment decisions such as the north Manchester business park in my constituency.

The Government believe in joined-up government, but this is not a joined-up decision. It is vital to the environment and to the transport and economic strategies of Greater Manchester that my hon. Friend the Minister solves the problem and ensures that Metrolink is put back on track and that investment starts as soon as possible.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There are 23 minutes remaining and three Members wish to speak before Front-Bench Members respond. I call Mr. Michael Meacher.

10.7 am

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West and Royton) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall be brief. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Ian Stewart) on securing a debate on this subject, which is of huge importance to the Manchester region and to north-west Members. Like my colleagues, I would also say that, in my experience, no other issue in recent times has caused such widespread and spontaneous bewilderment and anger as the announcement of the Government's decision not to go ahead with stage 3 of Metrolink. There are good reasons for that response.

Metrolink is the lynchpin in my constituency and in that of the Deputy Leader of the House of Commons of the housing market renewal pathfinder, which is an enormous £2.5 billion public-private investment in housing and community development throughout the Oldham-Rochdale area during the next 10 to 15 years. Metrolink is the trigger for several nodes of development across my constituency and the areas of Hollinwood, Derker and Werneth in Oldham. It is part of the recent urban vision for Oldham following the riots three years ago. Metrolink is regarded as a key factor in the renewal of our town.

It is also true that £200 million has already been spent on development and preparation for Metrolink, including the corridor between Manchester and Oldham. Many businesses have already made investment decisions based on the availability of the tram network. It is fair to say that the Manchester city region is the principal economic driver in the north of England and a major contributor to the national economy. Much of that is dependent on Metrolink.

We have already heard and are very well aware of the Government's reason for taking the decision; namely, affordability. Of course we are pleased that a working party is now examining alternative procurement options. We cannot presume the outcome, but the Government and my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) are keen to see a solution to the matter.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Stringer) indicated, the decision is not in any way limited to the issue of Metrolink. The escalation of costs has also been felt by other light rail systems. Crossrail in London and various road schemes have exhibited similar cost increases. That is due to a wide range of factors, but a key one is the increasing level of risk aversion on the part of the private sector. Developers are seeking to offload the risk factor of passenger numbers not reaching predicted levels on to the public purse.

One understands the Government's concern about that, but the problem is caused by the PFI structure. If my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington wants to get the costs down not only to the

£530 million to which they rose, but even lower, how far is that compatible with a PFI structure? The Government sought a way to resolve the problem in the case of London Underground by making a grant on a sufficient scale to reduce the escalation of costs for private developers. I think that I am right in saying that it has been decided to expend £12 billion on Crossrail, largely out of the public purse, which avoids the problem that we are saddled with in relation to Metrolink.

Metrolink is, and has been for many years, the cornerstone of Manchester's public transport strategy. As my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley rightly said, there is no alternative. It was never an end in itself or purely about transport schemes. It was designed to complement and to add value to a host of urban regeneration strategies. Certainly costs have risen significantly, but Metrolink is the most cost-effective way of achieving greater modal shift, increasing public transport use, reducing future congestion and delivering far-reaching economic and social benefits by its integration both with other public transport services and wider regeneration strategies.

Metrolink has been held up by the Government themselves as an exemplar system. It is certainly the most cost-effective and best of the light rail systems. It was recently given a clean bill of health by the National Audit Office report. Moreover, from the environmental point of view that I am anxious to stress, the three existing Metrolink lines already carry 19 million passengers and take nearly 4 million car trips off our roads. That contributes significantly to air quality in Greater Manchester. We believe that the future system, including the expanded capacity on phase 1, will attract about 50 million passengers a year and replace a further 5 million car trips.

Metrolink is a system for which there is no clear better-cost alternative. I beg my hon. Friend the Minister to find a solution to this problem through the revised procurement costs that are now being proposed by the working party. The Government's political credibility in the north-west is at risk here because, quite rightly, both my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister have indicated in the past their strong commitment to the area and to Metrolink as a central hinge for the future of the north-west.

Mrs. Lorna Fitzsimons (Rochdale) (Lab): First, I add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Ian Stewart) on securing the debate. I do so on behalf of those of my hon. Friends who are here to support him but who will not get an opportunity to contribute to the debate. They include my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin), the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Lewis) and my hon. Friend the Deputy Leader of the House of Commons.

Most Members present in Westminster Hall will know more about the history than I do, having lived longer, but to my knowledge Metrolink has been running for 13 years in Rochdale. My husband was a landlord on Drake street when the plans first appeared 13 years ago. Those plans have been in the consciousness of the people of Rochdale over the past 13 years, and they have planned their businesses and huge development programmes around them. I therefore cannot impress on the Minister enough the shock of the decision to the body politic of the people of Rochdale—not just to the professionals but ordinary people. That could be seen in the swift response that I received within hours of the announcement being made in July. I received e-mails from all over the world, from Rochdalians holidaying and working abroad, expressing their shock, disgust and dismay at the decision.

Not one of us pretends that the costs, which had risen from about £200 million to £900 million, were sustainable. To pretend that some of us think that if we exert enough pressure we will get the £900 million, is to be disingenuous and to misrepresent us. We all realise that the costs must be examined. However, we were saddened by the way in which the announcement was made.

The announcement was not expected. I have observed the situation during the seven years of my parliamentary life, and every time that there was a slight wobble we negotiated with Ministers to ensure that anything that needed to be done was done to ensure that we were still on track for phase 3 of Metrolink.

Hon. Members who spoke earlier indicated how successful Metrolink has been to date. The National Audit Office has also put on record how successful it has been. I cannot stress enough the importance of Metrolink in terms of the regeneration of places such as Rochdale. Over the past three or four years, I have chaired regeneration meetings at which we have discussed the design specifications received from the Greater Manchester passenger transport authority. Those specifications would allow local businesses to reinvest in their shopfronts to ensure that they are compatible with the design specifications for the preferred bidder for the development of Metrolink in Drake street. Millions of pounds of Government money have already been spent in the Drake street corridor and in other areas in other constituencies but, more importantly, thousands of pounds of individual business people's money has been spent. Those business people have made decisions about their entire livelihood and their future investment based on the collective promises made by Labour MPs and the Labour Government about Metrolink. I believe that we are honour-bound to find a solution.

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister of State is an honest broker in such matters, and I cannot praise him enough for the role that he and others have played in the working party in trying to find a solution. We must find a solution because, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher) stated, there are hundreds of millions of pounds of Government money for housing market renewal and for the regeneration of our town centres, such as the area around Kingsway, that depend on Metrolink. Our constituencies contain some of the poorest places in Britain—not just in Greater Manchester and the north-west, but in Britain—and the importance of the big bang to that regeneration cannot be overestimated.

At any stage we could have separated off into the various wings of Oldham and Rochdale, Ashton and the south, but it is crucial to ensure that the economic regeneration that is linked to the airport and the growth engine of the south of Manchester reaches the north through the centre. There are organisations in Manchester such as Knowledge Capital and Incubator Research in the World—at the biggest university in Europe. The effect of such organisations must be felt in constituencies such as mine, otherwise the regeneration money that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is deploying in Rochdale will not find its true value.

I therefore plead with the Minister to examine the matter in terms of the full cost of every pound of Government money. If we are analysing cost-effectiveness, how is the Minister's decision cost-effective in relation to the hundreds of millions of pounds of regeneration money being spent in Oldham, Rochdale and north Manchester? It is not cost-effective. It flies in the face of common sense. I hope that things are going in the right direction, but the clock is ticking. I beg that we do not try to approach this matter in a piecemeal manner, and that we realise that Metrolink makes good economic, environmental and social sense as well as being good government.

Mr. David Heyes (Ashton-under-Lyne) (Lab): I shall do my best, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to fit my speech into your time constraints.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Ian Stewart) on securing the debate. As other hon. Members have said, there is no issue of greater importance to our constituents than this, as has been demonstrated by the words—"shock", "disappointment" and "anger"—that they have used when expressing their concerns to us.

The debate is timely, although I can understand it if my hon. Friend the Minister does not agree, as he is in the middle of complex and difficult discussions with officials and the passenger transport authority. However, it is vital that our constituents know that everything possible is being done to resolve the impasse. Privately, I know that a lot of work is going on to achieve that, but I am not sure that the public fully understand it. We have a chance today to demonstrate that the process is moving forward.

I endorse the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Mrs. Fitzsimons) that the proposals are a package, which should hang together as a big bang. Inevitably, we will talk about the parts of the line that we know best, but, uniquely, my constituency contains two Metrolink lines—the line through Failsworth and Hollinwood to Oldham and the line from east Manchester to Droylsden and Ashton, and I will speak about both of them.

Failsworth town centre is desperately in need of regeneration. Recently a major shopping centre deal was secured in expectation of Metrolink arriving soon. Hollinwood sits in the centre of a site at junction 22 on the M60 Manchester outer ring road. It is an important brownfield redevelopment site—the largest single development site in Oldham—and it has been marketed with the aim of its becoming a major job-creation location. The Metrolink station was rebuilt at great cost several years ago in anticipation of these developments.

Hollinwood and Failsworth are within the housing market renewal area, a multi-million pound Government investment, to which my hon. Friends have referred. It looked like a nice bit of joined-up Government thinking that the housing market renewal area was to be designed around a Metrolink transport artery, and it is impossible to understand why that should now be put at risk.

On the Ashton line, Droylsden town centre is similar to Failsworth in that there are major plans for canal-side redevelopment there, with shops, hotels, offices and houses, and a deal was recently secured with a developer in the expectation that Metrolink would be a key driver for that town centre development. For much of the day, Droylsden is choked with traffic because of the inadequate road network and the poor public transport system. Ashton Moss is one of the north-west's major economic development sites; thousands of jobs are anticipated at that brownfield site and Metrolink would run through it. It is next to St. Peter's in Ashton, which is in the top 1 per cent. of the most deprived wards in the UK. The Ashton renewal team is doing tremendous work in dealing with the issues there, and they are centred around expectations in respect of Metrolink.

The town centre of Ashton is the terminus of the line and the town is fighting to cash in on the benefits of the opening of the M60 four years ago; large office and retail expansions are planned there and the town is battling to recover from the blow of the recent disastrous loss of its historic market.

Tarnside's economic development anticipates and depends on Metrolink as the core transport facility at the heart of a proper integrated transport system. The Metrolink to Ashton would carry more than 6 million passengers a year, and would save 2 million car journeys. An enormous amount of advance work has already been carried out, and that is what has most shocked my constituents. Ian Spencer, the head teacher of St. Mary's school in Droylsden, admitted to being completely baffled by the announcement. He spent three years in chaos, working out of temporary classrooms while the old school was demolished and rebuilt nearby to clear the way for the Metrolink station in Droylsden. He cannot understand the logic of what is happening, and I find it extremely difficult to explain it to him.

It was a moving event when the "Save Metrolink" campaign visited the school and the pupils—eight, nine and 10-year-old children—came out to the front of the school and made a tremendous noise, cheering and singing, in favour of Metrolink. They really made the point, and if young children can understand why it is vital to their future, it should be easy for that message to go to the people who must take some of the key decisions that will determine the future quality of those children's lives.

Many good residential properties have been demolished along the line of the Ashton link through Droylsden and Audenshaw. We have built a new bridge for Metrolink over the railway near Ashton and an expensive bridge over the motorway to accommodate Metrolink lines at Ashton Moss, which is wider than would otherwise have been necessary. We have demolished industrial premises in the town centre of Ashton. Saddest of all was the demolition of the Wellington road flats in Ashton town centre, which were cleared to make way for the Ashton town centre Metrolink terminus.

[Mr. David Heyes]

There was a long campaign by the residents of those flats to avoid demolition. Their spokesperson, Maureen Consiglio, organised an effective campaign which resulted in them being moved, en bloc, into a redeveloped block of flats, which was funded from the proposed Metrolink investment. Those elderly people now stand and look at the site where their previous homes were and which are now just a heap of bricks and rubble. They are baffled as to why their lives have suffered such upheaval and disruption to make way for something that just is not going to happen.

There has been support for the campaign throughout Greater Manchester and in my constituency from business, the press and the community and voluntary sectors, but mostly from local individuals. All that they have in common is the feeling that the proposals just do not make sense. On the Ashton line, all the advance work has been done and only the rails and lines need to be installed. All Tameside needs is the track.

At Hollinwood and Failsworth the situation is even more bizarre. The line to Oldham and Rochdale has rails and all it needs is the wires. The people of Ashton, Droylsden, Hollinwood and Failsworth have seen that Metrolink works. They want some of the action that has transformed the economies of towns such as Bury and Altrincham. That is what they were promised and that is what the working party is charged with doing: finding a way to make it happen. With hard work, good will and the wisdom and determination of the Minister and his team, I am confident that a solution can be found and that we will get Metrolink back on track.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Ian Stewart) on securing this debate. I want to make a few brief points in support of those made by my colleagues.

Anyone who tours Greater Manchester will see the piles of rubble, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Heyes) referred, where preparations for Metrolink have begun and, in some cases, been completed. A lot of public money has been invested in the scheme and it would be bizarre to people in Greater Manchester if the scheme did not come to fruition.

My hon. Friend the Minister has a deserved reputation for political toughness and earned respect when he said of Metrolink, "Not at that price." Most Labour Members understand that. Very few of us would argue that the public of Greater Manchester or the taxpayer generally should pay over the odds to those who will make money at public expense. A cheaper, more efficient scheme is in everyone's interest, but the Minister must take on board the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Stringer) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher) about the concept of risk. Quite frankly, the financing scheme that central Government imposed on Greater Manchester was not the right one. It transferred risk from the private sector, which conventionally bears risk, to the public sector. We, the public, will end up paying for the risk that the private sector cannot manage. In this day and age that is a ridiculous way to finance a project such as Metrolink.

The challenge is this. The Minister's reputation for toughness is real and deserved. He is a good politician. He must be tough with those in his Department who have come up with this misguided scheme, and he must introduce a better structure for the financing of Metrolink which allows us to deliver the scheme, which is long overdue in environmental, social and regeneration terms, in a financially efficient manner.

I conclude by reminding hon. Members that we hoped that Metrolink would run to the new stadium for the Commonwealth games. That did not happen, and two years on we are still waiting for even just the preparation. It is long overdue.

10.30 am

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove) (LD): I am pleased to take part in the debate both on behalf of the Liberal Democrats and as a constituency Member. Hazel Grove is the south-east corner of Greater Manchester, and although we are not direct beneficiaries of any of the three lines, my constituents are as dismayed by the cancellation of phase 3 as those of the hon. Members who have spoken so far. There is anger and bafflement, and many of my constituents are looking for answers. They want reassurance that there will be a Government transport policy for Greater Manchester and that we will not just be left with the ruins that we seem to have at the moment.

I am happy to make common cause with the eight hon. Members who have contributed to the debate and other hon. Members who have been referred to, including my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mrs. Calton). All of us believe that the scheme is right for the benefit not just of the immediate corridors that have been referred to, but of Greater Manchester as a whole and beyond. It is good that we can work together despite the fact that the hon. Gentlemen and I have often had cause to be upset with each other because we share a political community and have points of disagreement.

Mrs. Fitzsimons: May I suggest to the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd) that the people of Rochdale and Oldham welcome the Liberal Democrats' support, given the fact that they campaigned for years to include Hazel Grove rather than Rochdale and Oldham? The cross-party consensus is welcome.

Mr. Stunell: I thank the hon. Lady for that, and very much apologise for my inadvertently sexist remark.

Phase 3 covers three different routes, which are each important in different ways. Voices have been raised in support of the loop through Oldham and Rochdale, which has been referred to, while the hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Heyes) has made a good case for the Ashton line. The third route is out to the airport, which is of particular importance to my constituents. The airport has a strategy of getting 25 per cent. of its visitors to arrive by public transport. Each day, thousands of workers go to the airport site, and over the year millions of passengers take flights from there. My constituency is on the "flight path" of many of those going to the airport along the ground, so the pollution, congestion and environmental disbenefits of surface transport to the airport are very much in their minds. My constituency straddles key radial routes out of Manchester to the south, including the A6 in particular.

The surface transport plan to the airport is of great importance to us, but I suggest that it should also be of great importance to the Government. The airport strategy documents that they published this year point out the significance of Manchester airport as an economic hub for the north-west and detail their plans for it to become yet more significant in the next 25 years. Crucial to that is sorting out the surface transport arrangements, and crucial to sorting out those arrangements will be a tram link to the rest of the conurbation.

A second part of the Government's so-called integrated transport policy is important in this context: the south-east Manchester multi-modal study, commonly referred to as SEMMMS. That is a plan to reduce traffic, improve public transport, enhance cycle and pedestrian routes and complete the local road network. A crucial part of that is the capacity to extend the tram beyond the existing proposals for phase 3 to Stockport town centre, and ultimately to Bredbury, Romiley and Rose Hill. If the SEMMMS integrated transport plan is still part of the Government's strategy, I urge them to take that into account when they consider what to do about the tram routes.

Many of my constituents saw the Secretary of State's July statement as much more than a setback—they saw it as an outrage. I had a flood of unsolicited letters from my constituents despite the fact that they know that the tram will not reach them in phase 3. Many residents have signed petitions in local libraries and taken part in campaigns run by local newspapers such as the Stockport Express and the Manchester Evening News. Stockport council has unanimously called for the tram to be restored, citing environmental and economic grounds for doing so.

I have written to the Secretary of State three times in the past 10 weeks and I raised the issue in the House on 13 September. I have not had an answer to any of the letters I have written to the Secretary of State so far, and I might have considered myself unlucky, except that I have a letter from a constituent of mine who did get a reply. He wrote to the Deputy Prime Minister—I think that he thought he was writing to the boss—saying:

> "I sent a letter to Alistair Darling concerning the cancellation of Metrolink and also concerning the apparent South East England bias of the current administration. I received two identical replies from a Department of Transport civil servant . . . obviously standard replies being sent to all who questioned Mr. Darling's appalling decision."

That sums up neatly the concerns of my constituents. They feel that they have been treated with disdain and it appears that the Government have no clear strategy or focus for supporting us in the north-west.

Will the Minister confirm that the decision on the funding of Metrolink phase 3 has not changed the Government's commitment to implement the full recommendations of the SEMMMS report, which was previously accepted by the Secretary of State? That is vital in my constituency and throughout south-east Greater Manchester. Will the Minister give details to the House of his timetable for introducing the review of costings that has been referred to? It is quite a skilful sleight of hand to substitute a review of costings for the original announcement, which most of us understood would be of cancellation. It is a welcome sleight of hand—we do not have a problem with it—but what is the timetable for introducing clear plans for reactivating all three routes in phase 3?

Does the Minister acknowledge the displaced costs? Reference has been made to the Oldham loop and the £60 million or more that will have to come from other budgets. That is not the whole matter; the hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne raised the question of money spent on that corridor, and the airport has also built its tunnel and invested in works there. Does the Minister understand the displaced costs that will have to come from the public purse because of the abandonment of the schemes?

Will the Minister announce that he will answer the pleas of Labour, Liberal Democrat and Conservative Members from Greater Manchester to restore those vital schemes to the spending programme? Metrolink has already proved to be that rare thing, a successful public transport innovation. Its expansion and development is crucial for regeneration, the economy and the environment, both locally and in setting an example for the rest of the country. Manchester, Rochdale, Oldham, Tameside and the borough of Stockport stand to gain from the reactivation of the schemes, but the benefits will be felt much more widely.

The phase 3 scheme has the support of business leaders, the public, MPs and councillors of all parties. It has been commended by the Government's transport consultants, it underpins the SEMMMS strategy and I urge the Minister to throw his weight and voice behind its restoration as soon as possible.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Eccles (Ian Stewart) on securing this important debate. He has been a consistent campaigner on behalf of his constituents on the issue, as has my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady), who unfortunately cannot be with us today. I am well aware of the strong support for the future of Metrolink in Manchester and beyond. I attended a function organised by the Association of Conservative Clubs recently, when I was approached by Mr. Stephen Day, who used to be a colleague of ours representing Cheadle. He told me of his strong support for the extension.

In recent years, Manchester has enjoyed a remarkable resurgence, based partly on the hard work of its people, and partly—I like to think—on the economic framework put in place by the previous Conservative Government. It is fair to say that the Metrolink system has played a key part in that regeneration, helping to encourage firms to invest in the city. It is clearly a sign of how important the extension of Metrolink is that the Manchester chamber of commerce, supported by the CBI, the Institute of Directors and pro.manchester is co-ordinating a campaign to get Metrolink back on track.

It is no wonder that those organisations want to be involved when it is estimated that some 6,300 jobs will be created by the project. As part of its "back on track" campaign, the chamber of commerce is encouraging members of the public to express their opinions on its website, and the following comment posted there succinctly expresses the views of the majority of local residents:

> "Getting the next phase of the Metrolink back on track is . . . essential, not only from a local business point of view but also in developing further the massive tourism potential in the region, which is simply being put on hold by this action".

As the hon. Member for Eccles said in his opening remarks, the campaign has gathered more than 40,000 signatures, which is a clear expression of how important the project is to Manchester.

The Secretary of State for Transport has said:

> "Manchester's metro has been extremely successful", and recognised:

> "Light rail can be very effective in persuading people to use public transport", which is one of the Government's stated transport aims. Indeed, the Government's "Future of Transport" White Paper states that they want > "to support and encourage local and regional transport strategies to tackle congestion in towns and cities."

Local transport policies are vital, because if we do not get local public transport solutions right, an increasing number of people will take to their cars in despair, adding to the congestion from which we all already suffer.

The Deputy Prime Minister more than six years ago famously said:

> "I will have failed if in five years time there are not fewer journeys by car."

The 10-year plan promised a 5 per cent. reduction in inter-urban congestion, and an 8 per cent. reduction in large urban areas. Unfortunately, the result has been a predicted increase in journey times of 30 per cent. by 2010.

How will axing schemes such as the Manchester Metrolink extension improve those figures? The Deputy Prime Minister, who travelled to Manchester in 2000, said while there:

> "I am delighted to come to say I am making this announcement that the Manchester Metrolink extensions can go ahead."

The benefits were very clear to him at that time; he told the Manchester Evening News:

> "It is very much about an integrated transport system and Manchester has led the way. I've always been impressed by the development of Metrolink. It has encouraged people to use their cars less and public transport more. It's about the quality of life and about achieving our environmental objectives."

It is not often that I can say I agree with the Deputy Prime Minister, but on this occasion I do. It is strange that under the same Government—but two Secretaries of State for Transport later—the current Secretary of State does not agree with the Deputy Prime Minister's remarks. The Government's original plans were in no doubt: the Deputy Prime Minister said that he wanted to make Metrolink "the envy of Europe", and promised that there would be no strings attached to the promised funding. Is it surprising if the people of Manchester and some of their elected representatives now feel angry about the Government's perceived U-turn?

In its report, the National Audit Office highlights the real benefits that light rail schemes can provide to communities. The Manchester Metrolink is highlighted as one scheme that has > "brought significant benefits to passengers."

In fairness, the report also highlights valid concerns, which the Secretary of State referred to in justifying his announcement that he intended to scrap several schemes. The NAO report goes on to highlight problems with integration, which is rather damning for a Government who have made so much about integrated transport systems. It also highlights problems with through-ticketing and the time it takes to put schemes in place once they have been approved. However, the main problem identified by the report was financial. For those schemes to be successful, they must be financially viable and value for money. The NAO highlighted reasons for the costs having escalated, citing lack of standardisation, the adoption of heavy rail specifications and safety arrangements and barriers to the adoption of new rail technologies. The report guides us on how to reduce costs and achieve greater value for money.

Reducing the costs of a project and improving value for money is part of the key to the way forward. I have been impressed with the way that GMPTE has put forward serious ideas, such as the proposal to increase the length of leases for equipment in order to reduce annual costs. It is an important plan to improve the quality of life for local people, as correctly stated in 2000 by the Deputy Prime Minister and repeated today by all who have taken part in the debate. It is a unique occasion when every speaker takes the view that the Government have got it wrong, and they ought to reconsider the decision that they have announced. Not one speaker has supported Government policy on this issue.

I am happy to make it clear that I am a supporter of the scheme. My party supports the scheme and a future Conservative Government would consider more imaginative ways of funding the extension of Metrolink, as we would with other infrastructure projects.

Ian Stewart: The right hon. Gentleman has hit on an important point about suggested funding options. Will he explain exactly what his party would do?

Mr. Knight: I am in discussions with my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo), and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we will be making a policy announcement on this issue before the next general election. However, I cannot reschedule my party's policy announcements to suit this debate, as much as I would like to do so. We will make an announcement shortly.

My party would end the constant stop-start nature of major transport infrastructure projects. Too often, a project makes slow progress through the planning system only to be delayed indefinitely because the finances of the Government of the day do not permit large blocks of extra expenditure.

We have had a useful and important debate, with contributions of substance from all parties, but this debate should not be necessary. There should be no doubt about the future of the Manchester Metrolink extension, so I hope that the Minister in his winding-up speech will be positive and say that he has a solution that recognises the importance of the project to Manchester and the whole region. If he does not, he and the Government will be letting down the people of Manchester.

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Mr. Tony McNulty): I say at the outset, as ever in these debates, that I will come back to the facile contributions from the Opposition Front Benches and concentrate as much of the time as I can on the serious issues raised by my colleagues. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Ian Stewart) on convening the debate. I do not necessarily agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Heyes) about its timeliness or otherwise, but I appreciate from all colleagues that, unlike the previous contribution, there will be no detailed debate now on the deal or the way forward. It would simply be inappropriate, given where we are with the working party, to which I will return.

I also congratulate all Labour colleagues from Manchester on the campaign, which I fully understand. I have met a range of colleagues from Manchester since the decision, not least at the Labour party conference, where I met delegates and MPs and attended both of GMPTE's fringe meetings. I have no desire to read the Manchester Evening News, the Rochdale Express or the Bury Times, or to spoil my colleagues' Sunday meals by turning up on BBC North West with alarming regularity.

At the fringe meeting of the Labour party conference organised by GMPTE, I said that all of the key facts made—about regeneration, about the integrated nature of Metrolink and about the real wins that Metrolink extensions would mean for each and every community in Manchester, not simply those served by the three extensions—are without doubt. It is no surprise, and I fully endorse it, that my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister launched a document called "The Northern Way" a few weeks ago. At its heart, that document says that Metrolink and its extensions are integral to the regeneration of Manchester. They are but I repeat what I said then—not that project, not at those prices.

That is the entirely disingenuous and fatuous bit of the argument of both Opposition Front Benches. We did not hear a word about cost from the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell)—absolutely nothing. It was not even a major concern—we should just get on with it, he said. Go back to the last "shadow Budget", as it is laughingly called, and check whether it contains any more for transport this year: no. Last year: no. Successive previous years: no. It is easy to sit on the sideline as a minor third party and say, "Spend, spend, spend, spend, spend."

To the extent that there was any substance to the hon. Gentleman's comments, he dwelt on the airport link. For the purposes of the £900 million package—for want of a shorthand term for it—GMPTE deferred that link in December 2003. The link that the hon. Gentleman dwelt on is not even on the table in the package before us. It is not on the immediate agenda at all. The hon. Gentleman's contribution was very disappointing.

The right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) can talk eloquently about what a future Conservative Government will do. No future Conservative Government would, in any circumstances, consider a project that started at £282 million and topped off at £1 billion barely two years later and say, "No worries, we'll do it anyway." They simply would not do that and he knows it. So we will take his rhetoric, and that of his solo colleague in the Greater Manchester area, the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady), with a huge pinch of salt.

The comments made by my hon. Friends are well made. I need to challenge some of them but I want to address several of them in substance. I start with the odd red herring. That is not a football comment—red herring is a common phrase. What John Armitt—the chief executive of Network Rail—said was that if the Oldham to Rochdale link does not go forward as part of the regeneration, Network Rail has obligations under its contract with the Office of Rail Regulation to sustain, maintain and develop the Oldham link in the line.

The notion that it is eking a concession out of me to say that, if the Oldham to Rochdale link does not happen, Network Rail will have to sustain the line is a complete red herring. If that link does not happen—we are not at that point, but I will return to our general approach shortly—Network Rail's obligations will remain its obligations while the link is part of the heavy rail network.

Tony Lloyd: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. McNulty: I will not until I have made some progress, because plenty of colleagues made other important points. They are all important, and I want to address some of the others, but I may give way shortly.

At this stage at least, I cannot endorse the enthusiasm of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) not simply to get over these extensions but to bung in a few more—to Trafford Park, to the Manchester ship canal and so on. I understand the aspiration but let us do what we need to do now first.

I must challenge my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Stringer) on the notion that, in the past year or so, the matter has become a spectator sport. One of the first things that I did after joining the Department a year or so ago was meet the Manchester authorities and say, "Ok, your £282 million can go up to £520 million, but that's your absolute lot. It's capped and let's see what we can do with it." So, we almost doubled the costs. It was not a spectator sport.

Subsequent to that, there was a series of revisions, all starting from the premise of £520 million being the cash cap and any number of additions, all the way up to the latest ones of £500 million-plus annual payments. Those are, again, virtually double what we originally planned. In the year and a half that I have been in the Department, it has not been a spectator sport. I do not accept that for a moment. It is not enough for hon. Members, not least my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley, to say, "It ain't gold-plated." We know that it is not gold-plated, but we need to drill down and consider the costs. People cannot say, "Well, it's simple. Just accept the costs. That will be fine", because the costs are integral to what we are discussing. It may be said that any examination will not get to the bottom of what is going on in respect of costs, but my hon. Friend will know that any number of ideas are being thrown around now. If we believe the BBC, £300 million is suddenly going to be knocked off. If it is that easy to knock £300 million off, it must be worth further study.

Incidentally—I do not want to dwell on this—my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport did not give London £3 billion; he gave London £3 billion-worth of credit, so that Londoners could pay for London's infrastructure improvements. Ken Livingstone has gone for retail price index plus 10 per cent. on bus fares in the first instance. There is much more to come. It is slightly disingenuous to say that the Government are shutting the Manchester Metrolink but saying, "Here's £3 billion for London." That is not the case, and my hon. Friend knows it.

I shall not dwell on the north-south divide. As my hon. Friend said clearly, I do not agree about that. Nor do I believe that the Government's credibility in the north-west is at stake, or that, despite the importance that I, among others, attach to Metrolink, everything that the Government have done thus far in the north-west is suddenly withering on the vine because Metrolink is not proceeding.

I have several quick points on the background and the way forward. It is simply not right to say that Manchester's cost increases are exactly the same as those for schemes throughout the country; they are not. On the latest figures, the cost of this scheme is three times plus what it was originally. There is no comparable scheme of that size. Leeds is double; Portsmouth is close to double; and Liverpool, I think, is not even up to an overrun of 20 per cent. The magnitude of the cost increases in Manchester bears scrutiny. It is not enough simply to put that to one side and say that it belongs with everything else.

Yes, the National Audit Office has waxed lyrical, but it has done so about Metrolink as it is now. It is wrong to give the impression that it has waxed lyrical or given a rubber stamp or green light to Metrolink 3; it simply has not done so. The NAO has said good things about Metrolink thus far, and rightly so, but not about Metrolink 3. That point is important because, as my right hon. and hon. Friends will know, at least part of the deal on the table is the sustenance of the existing network. That makes it all the more important to move forward and get a deal.

The working party has met twice now, and we are due to meet again, I think, the week after next. We must try to find a way forward in an unfettered way, and I need to say this as clearly as I can: that might not mean preserving the big bang. If the big bang and £900 million is the starting point for a deal and it is that or nothing, I return to what I said earlier: not this project, at these prices. If we are to move forward and give Manchester the Metrolink that it deserves—I do not demur from that; I am fully signed up to it—everything should be on the table for the working party.

Phasing, the big bang, shifting the risk back and forth and procurement are all on the table. Drilling down beneath—design, build, maintenance and operation—must be on the table. Re-tendering the whole lot must be on the table. We must not fetter the working party, or the work that it needs to do to get Manchester to where we all want it to be, by locking ourselves in a box that says, "Big bang or nothing." With the will that has been shown thus far, and the work being done by the Department for Transport and Greater Manchester, we can get to the stage that all my colleagues and I want to reach, whereby all the regeneration benefits for Manchester, about which hon. Members have waxed lyrical, can proceed.

I say just gently in passing that the notion that the Liberal Democrats or the Tories would do things far better than the Labour Government is, to use a current phrase, an entirely flawed prospectus that is not worth looking at. We can get to where we want to be. We can get a timetable and a road map that put all these things back on track.

NHS Nursing Care

2 pm

Mr. Archie Norman (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): I am very glad to have the opportunity to devote the next hour and half to a discussion of nursing care in the NHS. I want to approach the subject constructively and I hope that the Minister will feel able to do the same and respond to some of the matters that I raise.

I do not intend to claim that there is a crisis in nursing care in the NHS. I shall, however, make a case for dealing with some of the emerging issues and argue that certain other concerns merit clarification, at the very least. It is important that all hon. Members recognise that although NHS nurses in general do fantastic work and are remarkably dedicated, they are comparatively less well paid, despite recent pay increases.

In many respects, nurses reflect the best of the public service ethos, and they undoubtedly provide outstanding care to the vast majority of patients most of the time. They are the bedrock of NHS patient care. Patients' experience and recollection of hospital stays, in particular, is affected as much by the way in which the nurses treat them as by any other factor. It is important to recognise that that patient care and the experience of being treated and looked after by nurses is driven more than anything else by the ethos, motivation and morale of the nursing work force. Highly motivated, well-intentioned, well-trained and disciplined nurses will give outstanding care, but those who work under stress and are demoralised within an unstable work force will find it much more difficult to do so.

When I researched the subject of nursing in the NHS, I found it extremely difficult to obtain many empirical, objective data—the Minister may be able to help with that. Nevertheless, there are quite strong emerging signs of increasing occasional lapses in the quality of personal care; I stress that they are only very occasional. I shall explain later why I think that may be happening.

Other emerging issues, including those of morale, work satisfaction and labour turnover—the number of nurses leaving the profession—are potentially serious and expensive for the NHS. Despite the increase in nurse numbers there are still considerable shortages in many NHS trusts.

I want first to deal with what has happened to the nurse population, why there are still shortages, and what evidence exists for problems of morale and retention and career development in nursing. On the face of it, there has been a significant growth in the number of nurses in the past six years. The Government have made such an increase an objective and have, broadly speaking, achieved it. Depending on exactly which figures one studies, it appears that in the past five or six years numbers of full-time employees have gone up by some 15 to 20 per cent. In 2003, according to the latest statistics that I have, 304,892 nurses were employed in the NHS. That increase compares, however, with an increase of approximately 11 per cent. in the number of consultant episodes and of 17 per cent. in accident and emergency attendance during the period in question.

There has been a marginal increase in nursing intensity in the NHS. The increase in nurse numbers and activity in a very labour-intensive service does not necessarily mean a significant increase in the available nursing time per patient. That, arguably, is what matters.

There has been a significant increase in the number of nurses in training—from 14,604 to 21,200 in 2001. I do not have more recent figures, but I understand that numbers have risen still further. However, it is important to remember that we are comparing the number of nurses and nurses in training with the relatively low figures of six or seven years ago. We could debate why those numbers reached those levels; it would be possible to argue that there was underinvestment in nurse training and nurse delivery. However, I do not intend to dispute such issues or to go into the history. Although the number of nurses in training has increased, drop-out rates have also risen. As 15 to 20 per cent. of nurses in training drop out before they complete their course, the increase in the numbers delivered is not as great as the increase in the number of nursing places.

Nurse shortages are still reportedly widespread in the NHS. It is hard to establish exactly how great the problem is, but the Royal College of Nursing estimates that there are 25,000 too few nurses, while official figures claim that the figure is nearer to 10,000 or 11,000. By any measure, there is still a significant shortage, despite the substantial increases that have taken place.

Despite the general lack of national statistics, studies have been undertaken on the shortages. They include the British Medical Journal article of September 2002 entitled "Mind the gap", which concluded:

> "The serious problems facing acute trusts in England in retaining and recruiting nurses result in high financial costs and low morale and may affect patient care."

It goes on to say that the problem is most acute in inner-city trusts, which will hardly surprise any of us.

The average age of nurses is growing every year. Although there are interesting reasons for that, it is also an indicator of the drop-out rate among younger nurses. The average age of nurses is reported to be 41; that is surprising, given the nature of the profession.

The gap in the supply of nurses, which has been created by nurses leaving the profession and despite the Government's efforts to increase the numbers coming onstream, has been plugged almost entirely by imported nurses. In fact, had we not brought in nurses from abroad over the past five or six years the number of nurses in the NHS would have remained more or less static. Moreover, 30 per cent. of students in nursing colleges are non-EU nationals. I do not mean to imply that recruiting qualified nurses and students from abroad is a bad thing—many of them perform an outstanding job and are extremely well qualified—but it is important to remember that it may leave us open to problems in future if getting nurses from abroad becomes more difficult and our shortages become more dramatic.

The flow of leavers from the profession is large and growing. That says a lot about people's willingness to stay in nursing and about morale in the profession. According to the register of nurses, the number leaving annually has roughly doubled compared with 10 years ago, and there appears to be a gentle upward trend. Of course, the number of nurses on the register is not an accurate measure of the number working in or leaving the NHS, but those are the figures that are available.

[Mr. Archie Norman]

The estimated 15 per cent. turnover rate of nurses leaving the NHS is rather high, especially bearing in mind that for the most part they do not leave for non-NHS nursing jobs, but leave the profession altogether.

There is evidence of increasing stress in nurses' work, not least because of hospitals' throughput levels, the need to meet standards and declining morale. I do not want to overstate that point, however, and there is reason to believe that it is part of a wider problem.

The Royal College of Nursing survey for 2003 suggests that 62 per cent. of nurses think that their workload is too heavy. I am not sure whether it has changed much over the years, yet the statistic reflects the concerns felt in today's workplace. The same survey said that 50 per cent. of nurses would not recommend nursing as a career to others. That is an alarmingly high figure—considerably higher, I should have thought, than 10 or 20 years ago. Curiously, 34 per cent. thought that NHS investment in nursing staff was decreasing, not increasing. Although many more resources have been put in and recruitment has increased, nurses feel that they are working harder than ever and that investment in staff is not adequate.

NHS spending on agency nurses has increased by about 80 per cent. in the past six years. The import of that is that agency nurses tend to have less longevity in the work place; that leads to a higher movement of staff through wards, which in turn creates a less stable workplace community that becomes much harder to manage.

I am not suggesting that any one of those factors is critical. Nevertheless, if we look at the total picture we see a profession in which numbers have increased through importing nurses but the number of leavers is rising. That may be a reflection of declining morale, changing workplace patterns and lack of work satisfaction among the nursing community.

The problem might be addressed in several ways; the Minister may want to refer to them. One salient issue is that a high proportion of nurses, especially young nurses, works on shift rotation, which tends to be family-unfriendly. The way in which acute hospitals are run makes it necessary to have nurses on shift rotations, so it is no good my simply stating the problem and telling people to solve it. It is clear, however, that because of today's quality of life issues and the range of options that are available to people it is increasingly hard to get young nurses of family age to work in that way.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): The hon. Gentleman is presenting an important case. Does he agree that given the recent settlement for general practitioners, which means that family GPs are now able to operate on a nine-to-five, five-days-a-week basis while continuing to be well remunerated, we should compare their ability to continue their family life with that of nurses who have to work shifts?

Mr. Norman: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. Not only among GPs, but in the broader health community, we have made progress in making health care work more family-friendly, and nurses working shifts are increasingly conscious of their relative position.

Having established the background in so far as it is possible with the figures available, I want to discuss the changing nature of the role and the diffusion of responsibility for nursing. Lapses in the quality of patient care occur not only because nurses are working very hard and are not always content with their working life, but because of the changing tasks that we are asking them to undertake and the hierarchy in the ward.

Since 1989, there has been a formative change in the nursing profession and in nurse training, with what was then called Project 2000 resulting in a substantial shift in the balance of nurses' training away from practical experience and into the classroom. In addition, the responsibility for the training has been shifted almost wholly from clinical to educational establishments. The arguments for those enormous changes seemed compelling at the time, but they have had important side effects. Nurses' training is now much more academic. Much of a nurse's work is very practical. Nurses enter their profession because they want to do practical work with patients, but spend half or more of their two to three years' training in a classroom environment.

That may have the effect of changing the type of people who enter nursing; it also means that nurses who come on to the wards are less experienced in practical training and the disciplines of nursing. Moreover, as has been widely reported, there is a shortage of mentors to work with training nurses during their clinical practice because a large number of trusts do not take nurses for practical training and there is a shortage of clinical placements. Generally speaking, the stress is on more academic and less practical nursing. I do not want to overstate that case because it is important that nurses should have an academic foundation as we ask them to undertake more complex medical and clinical tasks. However, it is a question of balance. The quality of clinical and practical experience that nurses have when they start working is perhaps not as good as it once was, although they are more qualified in other respects.

The other formative change in the workplace has been the development of health care assistants, or non-qualified nurses. That is significant not only in terms of the makeup of workplace economics and the division of tasks but of the effect that it has on the ward environment and the perception of role. On the whole, the rapid growth in the number of HCAs has happened for sound economic reasons. It is perfectly reasonable to employ people who are less well qualified and earn less to undertake less challenging tasks, but the ratio of qualified to unqualified NHS staff—30 per cent.:70 per cent.—may be approaching the limits of what is manageable.

In theory, health care assistants are supposed to have a national vocational qualification, but the evidence suggests that a large number do not. The King's Fund estimates that only 30 per cent. have a full NVQ, while others may have as little as six weeks training before they start on the wards. Yet in a pressured ward environment HCAs are inevitably asked to undertake important functions, some of which are medically sensitive. Unison conducted a survey—in 1999, so it is out of date—showing that HCAs' tasks can include help with drug administration. Some 18 per cent. carried out invasive procedures, 11 per cent. took blood samples; and 61 per cent. helped with catheter care.

We should not imagine that HCAs undertake only menial or basic tasks, because they are becoming an important part of the patient-health service interface. Anecdotal and survey evidence suggests that some patients have more interaction with assistants than with qualified nurses. It is potentially serious that some HCAs have had very little training and have arrived through what is in effect an unregulated route. The Minister may want to consider whether there is a compelling case for regularising the role of HCAs—I was going to say "regulating", but I do not want to give the wrong impression; I mean that we should standardise their minimum training requirements and what is expected of them—and establishing a smoother career progression that would allow people to start work with the minimum level of training, qualify as HCAs, then qualify as nurses and move on through the management and clinical hierarchy. The elements of progression have been put in place without proper ladders or quality controls.

The other side of the issue is the development of the so-called academic nurse. By way of illustration, although it is not very scientific, The Guardian of 11 October quotes Claire Rayner, the president of the Patients Association, who refers to the lack of practical training of nurses and the development of "academic nurses" and cites the > "yawning gap between academic nurses, who have to spend more time pen-pushing than giving patient care, and the less informed healthcare assistants."

That is backed up by anecdotal evidence from constituents, relatives and other people with recent hospital experience who have told me that nurses on the ward felt that they were too important to undertake patient cleaning and other basic patient care activities. That is unacceptable.

According to the nurse's job description, it is not necessarily part of their official role to deal with the basic tasks of patient care. The qualified nurse is asked > "To provide planned nursing care for patients and their families; To assist in the management and organisation of work as required."

The HCA's role is described in a subtly different way. He or she

> "Assists qualified staff by undertaking personal care duties for patients; Reports patient condition to qualified staff."

In a way, the role of the qualified or academic nurse is being institutionalised as having to do with clinical care and that of the HCA as having to do with cleaning patients and ensuring that they are comfortable. I say this with no disrespect, because I know that the vast majority of nurses are absolutely dedicated to total patient care. However, it is important for the NHS to be unambiguous about the fact that all nurses on the ward are responsible for ensuring that patients are clean and comfortable and that their psychological and personal requirements are looked after. We increasingly hear patients complain that they feel neglected because no one comes to clean them, look after them or ensure that they are comfortable. When my mother-in-law was recently in hospital, she was not provided with a proper pillow for 48 hours.

Such problems stem from the emerging hierarchy in the ward environment. They do not only arise in the UK; in Australia and Canada, programmes introduced to increase the number of lesser qualified nurses or HCAs in the ward environment have had a material impact on the number of mistakes made with patients, as well as on clinical outcomes. I am not saying that the writing is on the wall, but we can learn from the experiences of other countries. We must establish exactly what the roles are to ensure that a situation does not developing whereby some people look after patients and others are primarily clinical in their approach. There is a level beyond which the ratio cannot be pushed.

The last aspect of the problem to which I want to refer is the nature of the workplace and the loss of accountability for the ward environment. There was an entirely different system in the early days of the NHS, although I am not advocating a return to that. For example, ward discipline—control of the ward environment—was much better, which helped nurses to do their jobs and to ensure that patients were properly looked after. Through custom and practice, we have allowed that to slip away. It is a question not just of bringing back matron and putting people in charge, although there is a bit of that involved, but of working and management practice throughout major hospitals. Part of the problem is that many hospitals now have almost uncontrolled visiting hours, which means that nurses no longer have two or three hours in the morning when they can get back control of the ward environment and ensure that it is clean and under control and that patients are properly looked after.

Another problem is that doctors and other members of staff are able to stroll around the ward at will and to appear at unexpected times of day. That may not happen all the time, but it undermines the ward sister's role and her ability to say, "This is my ward. I am in charge of this environment and can be held accountable for it." When my father was a consultant, before there was an NHS, there was no question of his turning up on the ward without permission. He would have to arrive at the right time, then he would be presented with his starched white coat and told when people were ready to receive him. Needless to say, when that happened all the blankets were folded and everything was neat and tidy. I accept that that is a bygone era, but nursing is partly to do with discipline—the ability to control things and having standards that are rigorously enforced. Ward sisters should have enough spare time to check that everything has been done properly and to lead and teach the ward staff—the other nurses and HCAs—to ensure that they are doing their jobs well.

In most major acute trusts, turnover on the wards is probably much higher than the 15 per cent. that I mentioned earlier. If about a third of the ward staff move on every year, as in some trusts, it is much harder to establish a workplace community or any sort of continuity. It is also harder for sisters to manage new staff, who often have to deal with problems that are outwith their experience and need to be shown the ropes.

The Minister is probably planning to refer to modern matrons, and I do not intend to be critical of the initiative to bring them on board. In most trusts, however, the modern matron is not matron as we used to know her, but a new layer of management. The critical role is that of the ward sister, as the person who is in charge of the ward, not that of the modern matron, who takes broader responsibility for an array of tasks that fall outwith the ward sister's role. The critical question is this: does the ward sister have the capacity and the authority to make decisions about who comes on to the ward and when, the cleaning on the ward, and the management of his or her staff?

We have previously debated MRSA in this Chamber. That is a central issue, as the development of MRSA is all about cleanliness in the ward environment and thus the ability of nurses and HCAs to control what happens there.

I invite the Minister to comment on the emerging trends that I have outlined. Despite the growth in the number of nurses, there is still a problem with nurse shortages that could grow. We are highly dependent on imported nurses, which, if nothing else, would put us somewhat at risk were the flow to dry up.

There are also important issues to do with the balance of qualified and non-qualified staff on wards. The role of HCAs in relation to the standard of the qualifications with which they enter the NHS is becoming a serious issue. It is fundamental that we do not allow a hierarchy of personal care to develop. There is a risk that some nurses may feel that they are a little too important to do the menial tasks involved in caring for patients. That would represent a major erosion of the successful culture of service in the NHS. There must be a case for creating a better continuum of career development through the nursing profession. We need to understand why the number of people leaving the nursing profession seems to be growing and why the average age of nurses seems to be rising.

Is the Minister satisfied that steps have been taken to re-establish a greater sense of discipline and control of the ward environment? That would help to improve the working environment, team working and the people's development, as well as to deal with the more fundamental issue of cleanliness and MRSA.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I remind the Chamber that this debate is time-limited, and we must conclude by 3.30 pm. I am required to call the first of the three Front-Benchers to make their winding-up speeches 30 minutes before that—in 30 minutes' time. I therefore appeal to hon. Members who seek to contribute to the debate to take that time constraint into consideration both when making speeches and when accepting or responding to interventions.

2.30 pm

Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): I am delighted that the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) secured this debate. As a former nurse, I often think that being given the opportunity to talk about nursing is an indulgence, but I am truly grateful that we have the opportunity to talk about many of the issues that face nursing. It is a valuable debate to have.

A couple of weeks before the 1997 general election, I was still nursing on a ward in my constituency. Subsequently, for no remuneration, I have done some night duty, for the experience, and so as to reconnect with many of my colleagues who are still in the profession. There is little doubt that nursing remains one of the most amazing, challenging and wonderful professions for anyone to go into.

I am guilty of the following offence: I am totally bound by the principle of wards and nurses, when we need to remember that nurses work in all sorts of settings and ways and with all sorts of people. In this debate, it would be wrong not to acknowledge the range of nurses—men and women of all shapes and sizes, working with the elderly, or with young people, and working in ways that may be different from what we shall discuss today. It is important to remember that the nursing profession is incredibly wide, and offers enormous opportunities for many people. The estimate is that more than 80 per cent. of care in the NHS is delivered by nurses, so it is right and proper that we should focus on those care givers.

We need to be clear that nursing in the 21st century is a different deal from what it was even when I started my nursing training in the early 1970s, in that nurses must now work in partnership. The hon. Gentleman created a wonderful picture, and I remember the ward sister's vice-like grip. She was able to create her own environment. At times it was not particularly encouraging of new nurses, or nurses who wanted to progress or develop their skills, but it was a way of making sure that she kept a grip on her ward.

Of course, we cannot operate in that way today. Being an excellent ward manager, and being in charge of a team of people who contribute to nursing care, is a different deal. It is important to give the ward cleaner an equal say about what happens in a particular setting, and it is important to ensure that the consultant is aware that he or she should do a ward round at the appointed time, outside the protected mealtime—an important new development in the NHS, which I welcome. We must remind consultants, as well as nurses, that it is important to wash their hands between patients.

The picture that emerges of nursing and of the care delivered is different from what we might expect, because without that co-operation and that sense of everyone contributing, the workplace cannot function.

The hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells talked about Project 2000. Few of us—certainly few in the profession—would argue that we should return to hospital-based training, because it was so variable. We now use the phrase "nurse education", and nurses are properly educated through the university system. I understand why we moved to the university-based system, and respect that decision. Although that change has created problems, it has without doubt raised the standard of education of nurses and ensured that people have a proper career path into nursing.

I was interested in the hon. Gentleman's comments about the average age of nurses, which has been affected by several factors. I am not sure that it was right for me to go, as I did as a young woman, straight into nursing from a pre-nursing course at college, but I did so because I was so determined to become a nurse. When I go to the nurse education centre at the university of Sussex and talk to people in nurse education, I see a tremendous age range, and I find that heart-warming.

It is encouraging that people who may want a career in the nursing profession, or a profession allied to nursing, who have become health care assistants but later realise that what they really want to do is to become fully trained and registered nurses, can do so. That is an excellent way to get people into nursing, because it overcomes many of the problems that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, such as the lack of ward-based experience.

There is little doubt that classroom education is desperately needed. I well remember going straight on to the ward after six weeks in a nursing school and being asked to look after 10 intravenous infusions for people who had serious operations. That was unacceptable. The whole flavour of nurse education has changed. If people who have experience on the ward, such as health care assistants, take a measured decision to move into nursing, and trusts encourage that path into nursing and offer support, that is a tremendously efficient way to get nurses into training, not only because such people turn out to be excellent nurses, but because the chances of their falling away from nurse education are much reduced, since they know exactly what they are going into. That area could benefit from further expansion.

Nurses make such a difference today. None of us should run away from the fact that nursing is incredibly pressurised. The way in which the NHS is being reformed and is responding to patients' needs, and the pressure on those who have to deliver care, makes it much more difficult for them: they have to think quickly about how to ensure that patients are treated decently and in time, and that they are not kept waiting. Such considerations add to the problems of those who deliver care, most of whom are nurses.

The hon. Gentleman is right to say that concerns and complaints are often about nursing and associated issues, such as how we care for people on wards. That is understandable, but there are ways to tackle the problem. Many nurse organisations and trade unions are contributing to the way in which nurses develop and gain new skills.

The Royal College of Nursing's "Nursing the Future" campaign is superb, and came from America. It involves a series of nurse ambassadors from all areas of nursing who go out into schools and into the community, promoting nursing in a positive way because they feel positive about what they do and they want to go out and explain what nursing is all about. They all appear in different ways: a mental health nurse turns up in his jeans, while a formal ward nurse wears her uniform.

We can develop nurse education in many ways. The key is giving power to nurses, and we have made enormous strides. The Government have accepted and had to sort out the awful morass of nurse prescribing, which was mouldering in the doldrums and not making any progress. Now we have a comprehensive range of nurses who can prescribe, and do many other good things, themselves. In some settings they can order their own X-rays, and can ensure that everyone is ready to come in and get organised for out-patients' appointments. They have the power to organise their own workplace.

I have visited many areas to see how nurses can operate, and to ensure that they feel valued by their trusts—that is the point. A nurse today, without doubt, is highly respected. However, nurses are also under enormous pressure. They can rise to that challenge if we ensure that we value them as a profession, and support them. We should not have a silly, rose-coloured-spectacles view of nursing, but we should support nurses properly, either through the Government or by the way in which the community relates to nurses. They do not want wishy-washy support; they want their profession to be properly recognised. I firmly believe that we are moving in that direction. The pressure is on for them, but I am convinced that they are up to the job.

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman), not only for raising this issue but for tackling it so sympathetically and constructively, and not in a party political way. I also want to pay tribute to the hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) for her long experience in nursing—and for warning me before this debate that I had to be a little careful about what I said about nurses, as she is sitting so close to me.

Recently, after a Health Committee meeting, I received an extraordinarily rude letter from a constituent. At that meeting we had been talking about nursing, and I and other Members had repeatedly referred to nurses as being of the feminine gender. That lady got very worked up about that, and it is important to recognise that nurses are of both sexes, of equal efficiency and equal value.

Having got that off my chest, I want to remind the Chamber of what Florence Nightingale said in 1860:

> "No man, not even a doctor, ever gives any other definition of what a nurse should be than this—'devoted and obedient.' This definition would do just as well for a porter. It might even do for a horse. It would not do for a policeman."

Thank goodness that definition went ages ago, thanks to Florence Nightingale and lots of other people. I agree with the hon. Member for Crawley; I am talking more about hospital nursing, and in hospitals there is a partnership. The nurse is no longer the handmaiden of the doctor. She or he is an equal partner in the ward team running the show in the best interests of the patients.

I want to concentrate on one aspect of nursing that I fear is being lost in some respects—I shall consider the reasons for that after I have given some examples. I am talking about the role of the nurse as the advocate of the patient. All patients are supposed to have named nurses when they go into hospital; that is crucial. With the decrease in the hours that doctors are allowed to work and the lack of continuity of care from the medical profession, continuity is provided by nurses, who have always worked on shifts and are therefore used to handing over when they move on. However, it is in the advocacy role that nurses are needed. That is sad, but it is so.

I echo what the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells said; it would be easy to be highly critical, because most of the letters that we get are critical rather than supportive. Let me give some examples of cases in which a nurse's advocacy was missing.

An 82-year-old man had an epidural injection that went wrong, resulting in a respiratory arrest, so he was really very ill. He was transferred to another hospital for overnight observation because the first one could not keep him overnight. At 7.30 in the evening, after seven hours on a trolley, he was seen by a consultant, who said, "If you can walk, you can go home." His elderly wife was there, his son came by car, and they struggled to get his clothes on. He could just walk, so he did go home—and his wife was up all night. In my day, which was after the time of the hon. Gentleman's father, the nurses would not have allowed that. They would have stepped in and said to that consultant, "This chap can't go home now." That is one factor that is missing.

In another case, a 91-year-old suffered from unhygienic conditions on the ward, lack of personal care, two falls, pressure sores, incontinence, loss of dignity and loss of the will to live. The patient died, and there was even a delay in the notification of the death. In a third case, a 19-year-old died of a subarachnoid haemorrhage, which was probably inevitable. The family was up in arms because the information given during the poor girl's final illness was scanty and hopeless. Again, in my day, if I, as a doctor, had been guilty of handling that family as it was handled—this occurred not at my hospital, but a long way away—the nurses would have slaughtered me. They would have gone in and explained to the family exactly what was going on.

The worst example of all is the case of Victoria Climbié. In the inquiries, the social workers were blamed and the doctors were blamed a little bit—I think that the doctors should have been blamed a great deal more—but where were the nurses? One morning, when she was in hospital, a locum senior house officer was on duty, with no consultant cover, for one single shift, and at no stage was that locum instructed by the nurses about what was going on. That loss of advocacy is very severe. Beverly Malone has spoken about people being "too posh to wash", but I will not carry on that theme.

Why have we got into this state? Enough has been said about Project 2000. I agree with the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells, in that I think that things have gone a little too far. I agree about academic training, but that must be balanced with more practical training.

There are issues of stress, overwork, undue reliance on agency nurses—who inevitably do not take the same responsibility for the patients as permanent staff do—and ward discipline, in which I am a great believer. When I first arrived at the hospital where I was to work as a consultant, I was staggered when I walked into the office and all the nurses and sisters stood up. I had not been used to that at a London hospital, but that was the discipline.

Nurses must cope with the tremendous expectations associated with widening roles. There are nurse practitioners, nurse consultants, managers, modern matrons, and emergency care practitioners, and they are expected to take on the job of the junior doctors who are not there to do it. GPs no longer do the job at night either, so there is a tremendous strain on the nurses.

I recently attended a lecture by an eminent professor of nursing called "The death of nursing". He made the point that every time there was a change, people would say, "Oh, that's the death of nursing." He believed that nurse leaders had to respond to all the changes by ensuring that they had different ways of working. His main point related to leadership of the trained nurses to get the students, the cleaners, the health care assistants and the junior doctors all working together. I am not altogether in favour of modern matrons; that is simply a name for the unit nursing officers whom we used to have. I would much prefer there to be one senior matron, who makes everyone quail when she goes round the wards.

I appeal to the Minister to remember that the traditional job of a nurse is caring for, as well as organising, other people. A little more practical training would help. As Tacitus said, "Experience teaches," and, from the 16th century:—

"Experience is the best teacher."

"Experience is the father of wisdom."

2.52 pm

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) on securing this very important debate, and echo the praise given by the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) for the way in which the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells made his case.

It is a pleasure to follow both the hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) and the hon. Member for Wyre Forest, because they both speak from a great deal of personal experience of working in the NHS. I declare an interest to an extent, in that my wife is a former nurse. She still occasionally works on a nurse bank in a local hospital.

Like the hon. Member for Wyre Forest, I want to concentrate on acute hospitals. As the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells rightly pointed out, there may be a disjunction between our debate on the statistics for nurses coming and going, retiring and moving to the country, and what is being delivered in the real world and the stresses and pressures experienced on the wards themselves. I shall concentrate my remarks mainly on wards.

We need to recognise that, as from April this year, the starting salary of a trained nurse will be £17,060 a year. When one compares the antisocial hours, the responsibilities, the life-and-death decisions that nurses have to take or participate in taking, the stresses and strains, and the physical nature of the job, with those of other professions—for example, the police—nurses are undervalued in terms of remuneration.

The hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells rightly emphasised the change in the nature of nurses' training since the introduction of Project 2000. There must be an appropriate balance between the academic and the practical, or the clinical. Those who have been involved in nursing for many years repeat that, in their experience, many new nurses are well trained academically but need more clinical experience before they are let loose on the wards.

In an intervention on the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells, I attempted, perhaps not particularly well, to contrast nurses, who work antisocial hours and shifts—necessarily, as wards operate 24 hours a day—who make life and death decisions and who accept all their responsibilities, and are paid at a certain level, with GPs, who recently managed to secure for themselves—in effect, and if they so wish—a nine-to-five job, five days a week. Compared with nurses, they are well remunerated.

I am not saying that GPs do not deserve their pay or that they do not do a good and important job for which they should be properly remunerated, but I question whether the difference in levels of pay for GPs and nurses is appropriate, given the responsibility that nurses have, particularly on acute wards. I would argue from a Back-Bench position that perhaps there is a need for a review, although I would not commit my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) to spending plans, which are for him, not me, to make.

I have only a few minutes left in which to emphasise two points. The first is about the amount of paperwork that nurses are now required to deal with in order to maintain their responsibilities on wards. As I see it, nurses have taken up new roles as patient biographers. They must complete a veritable encyclopaedia of information before patients can be admitted. They need superhuman powers to find the time to engage in nursing care itself, on top of all the paperwork.

Recently, I asked a nurse how much paperwork had to be completed when admitting a patient. I was told that a 28-page form must be completed when a patient is admitted to an acute ward, and that a great deal more paperwork must be completed during their stay.

Laura Moffatt: Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that taking a really good case history and background of the patient contributes to good nursing care throughout that patient's stay?

Andrew George: A balance needs to be struck between the amount of paperwork and the amount of time left for nursing care—that is a question of judgment. I simply make the point that many nurses say that much of the data and information collection is unnecessary, does not help with their job, does not help them come to clinical decisions on the ward and does not necessarily assist with the longer-term care of the patient. They estimate that the amount of paperwork has increased by about 30 per cent. in the past two to three years.

In early September, the Daily Mail—if I dare quote from it—published a letter from Sally Boxall, who stated:

> "I'm one of the 40,000 nurses quitting the NHS—in my case, after 25 years. The reasons that have led to my frustration at the whole soul-destroying set-up include the paperwork . . . nurses are expected to make it a priority, before patient care", and that they have become bed managers rather than carers. We must recognise that there is a difference between what we debate in this Chamber and what actually happens on the ground.

I spoke to nurses recently about a current case in a Cornwall acute trust. Twice during the past two weeks, night duty—from 9 pm to 8.30 am—was covered by one recently qualified D grade nurse on £17,000 a year. She and two health care assistants had care of a ward of 28 seriously ill patients. That nurse had to administer drugs, put in and change drips, discuss medical care with doctors, give information to relatives, talk to nurses from other wards about the transfer of patients, admit emergencies, administer injections, change catheters, insert nasogastric tubes, and decide whether patients needed oxygen or a remedy for low blood sugar levels. She also had to deal with cardiac arrests, although it needs two nurses to resuscitate patients. I understand that is happening regularly. The local NHS acute trust hospital is short of 80 qualified nurses.

There are serious problems. Nurses are undervalued as well as being underpaid. I hope that the Government recognise that, and that they will take those issues on.

3 pm

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): I add my congratulations to those expressed to the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) on securing this debate. I also congratulate him on the manner and tone in which he presented his argument and the evidence that he gave in support of it, and I congratulate all who have contributed to the debate. I shall pick up a number of the points that have been raised.

First, I echo what was said at the beginning of the debate about the nature of nursing. Nurses are dedicated, but they are still less well paid than many others in the public sector. As my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) said, unfavourable comparisons can be made with other public sector workers, some of whom have done very well—they have received increases in salary and their work is valued.

The hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells was right to say that nurses are the bedrock of patient care in the NHS and that they embody the very best of the public service ethos. We must do everything we can to cherish and protect that, and to build upon it. During the next few minutes, I shall run through some of the issues that have been raised.

The hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) rightly said that hon. Members had so far focused on nursing in the hospital setting; she said that nursing was far from being confined within the boundaries of NHS or other hospitals. The profession reaches into many other settings. I think particularly of the key role that nurses play in primary care; increasingly, they lead primary care teams, and many have become practitioners with specialist interests. As we heard, they have taken on a prescribing role, they run clinics, and they are taking a lead in developing and supporting self-management. Those are some of the many aspects that make the profession one that more people should consider as a career. I certainly support the "Nursing the Future" campaign that has been mentioned.

It is worth mentioning the British public's view of nursing—assuming that polls are an accurate reflection of their views. In a poll for Nursing Standard, MORI found that 81 per cent. of people believe that nurses are caring and understanding. In the same poll, eight out of 10 people said that they thought nurses were extremely hard-working. This year, through its in-patient questionnaire, the Healthcare Commission asked patients, "Did you have confidence and trust in nurses treating you?" We should remember that 75 per cent. of respondents in England said, "Yes." We MPs can often be disproportionately influenced by our mailbags. People tend to write to us only when things go wrong, but we must remember the good things when looking at the overall picture.

[Mr. Paul Burstow]

Reference was made to the ongoing concern about hospital-acquired infections and the need for a management structure that allows nurses to be more clearly in control of the ward environment. For example, concern has been expressed during the past few years about the way in which contracts were let for cleaning and catering in hospitals. Those contracts led to a fragmentation of the chain of control and command in hospitals, which made it more difficult for ward sisters, matrons and others to be confident that what needed to be done could be done immediately, rather than having to go through a lengthy contractual process.

It is interesting to read the reports, also in Nursing Standard, on the National Patient Safety Agency's hand hygiene campaign. The agency found that on average only 40 per cent. of necessary hand hygiene procedures were carried out. I mention that because earlier today I had the pleasure and privilege of visiting the Epsom and St. Helier NHS Trust and joining the infection control team there—Dr. Sharon Chambers, Dr. Louise Neville, Mandy Cehssum and Gill Hickman, who are the infection control nurses—as part of its infection control week.

I visited wards, met a number of modern matrons and the sisters in charge, and took part in a practical exercise to see how good people were at hand hygiene. The powder was put on, and people's hands were washed and run under the scanners. The experience was most interesting—although I came out worst—and it was a good demonstration of how engaged wards are with infection control teams. I applaud what is being done to encourage people to become engaged, in a competitive way, with basic hand hygiene, which is an important aspect of reinforcing good practice.

I want to pick up something that the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) said about pressure sores. My hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives was keen not to commit me to any spending figures in this debate, but we need to consider how to ensure that the resources now available to the NHS are used to best effect. To rehearse some figures, it cannot be to the best effect for more than £2 million a day to be spent on treating bedsores in the NHS. Nearly one in 10 patients are affected by bedsores, more than 90 per cent. of which are preventable.

Good health care assistant practices can materially alter that situation. For example, some research suggests that spending £200 on a pressure mattress can save £1,500 on treating bedsores. There are ways in which the resources can be used more effectively. That would introduce a quantum leap in the quality of care of the individual and save the NHS resources to boot. We should ensure that the existing examples of good practice on bedsore management and reduction become the norm. Perhaps some of the examples of infection control that I have given could be repeated for bedsores.

Feeding is also important. Recent research shows that 40 per cent. of patients going into hospital are already malnourished, and that 70 per cent. of those will become more malnourished within a week of their admission. Addressing the annual meeting of the Royal College of Nursing in Harrogate about the issue, Caroline Lecko, a matron at King's College hospital, said:

> "We saw on the wards that they were extremely busy over the lunchtime period, so busy that the food really wasn't being noticed by nurses, by doctors, by therapists and everybody was too busy to make sure that patients were actually eating. We were seeing patients not really being prepared for meals and not being made comfortable to eat, with food left out of reach."

That is a real concern about practice being overlooked. Ensuring that food is eaten is linked to the other points that have been made about health care assistants.

Reference has been made to age profile of the nurse work force. With between one in five and one in four of the work force over 50, the NHS still faces the huge challenge of ensuring that we do not experience increasing shortages again over the next few years, despite the welcome increase of 67,500 since 1997. Just across the pond, the US estimates a shortfall of 1 million, and nurses are being actively recruited over here. Such pressures will intensify, not go away, and thus further increase our need to import overseas entrants into our work force, as has been said. For instance, last year more than half of those registered with the Nursing and Midwifery Council came from overseas.

One of my concerns about agency nurses relates to the Audit Commission's work a couple of years ago. The commission had serious concerns about the training, supervision and management of agency nurses entering the ward environment and said:

> "All these factors increase the chances of patients receiving care of a poorer quality than they would otherwise get."

We spend £1.7 million per day on NHS nurses in agency roles. That is a large sum of money, but I am not certain that it necessarily achieves flexibility for the permanent work force.

That brings me, briefly, to training. A report published in May entitled "Failing Students" echoed mentors' concerns about the academic quality and competence of nursing trainees. Can the Minister explain what is planned for taking forward the work of the Nursing and Midwifery Council on standards for the preparation of teachers of nursing and midwifery to ensure a necessary improvement in the quality of students coming through? I am not talking about those who give up, but those who get through into practice. The NMC report shows that mentors are ringing alarm bells and saying that some people are getting into practice who should not be there.

In conclusion, nurses are the bedrock, and we must do all we can to support them. I look forward to the Minister's response.

3.10 pm

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): I add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) on securing the debate and on his contribution, as well as the subsequent contributions. We should make it clear that we owe a debt of gratitude to all NHS staff, not just nurses, for their hard work and commitment. The phrase has been used many times, but our nurses are the bedrock of our NHS. In many ways, in people's minds nurses reflect the standard of care that they receive in the NHS. We owe them all a debt of gratitude.

My hon. Friend rightly focused on standards and drew our attention to one or two areas that could be improved. In particular, he mentioned the importance of morale. There is no doubt that morale within the NHS, particularly among the nursing profession, is not what it should be. The Royal College of Nursing survey "Stepping Stones" surveyed around 10,000 nurses at the beginning of this year. One third said that they would quit the profession if they could, and 11 per cent. said that they planned to quit it in the very short term. The internal rotation shift system to which my hon. Friend referred—days, evenings and nights within a short period—was particularly unpopular. It is no surprise that the number of nurses leaving to work in the USA has doubled in the past year alone.

That poor morale has been caused in large part by the Government's micro-management of the NHS through its targets. There is no doubt in my mind that the Government's targets are well intentioned. No one can argue about an increase of more than 40 per cent. in NHS spending, but I believe that the Government are underestimating the extent to which targets are sapping morale within the NHS. Targets, however well intentioned, are preventing money from reaching front-line services, and there is strong evidence to suggest that they are distorting clinical priorities and that is demoralising staff. Targets are clogging up the system, and that is why the NHS is suffering so many retention and recruitment problems. After such a massive increase in spending, there has been only a modest increase in activity. We have seen a 40 per cent. plus increase in spending, but only a 5 per cent. increase in hospital treatment. Patients are suffering because they are having to wait far longer than necessary to be treated. The turnover figures are there for everyone to see.

I believe that the NHS turnover rate runs at around 22 per cent.—well above the national average. In financial terms, that is costing the NHS about £1.5 billion a year—the price of 10 new hospitals. A report by the Audit Commission in 2002 on this issue cited specific factors such as lack of professional autonomy, a sense of being undervalued by the Government and bureaucracy. Those are, without doubt, some of the problems.

I could go on giving evidence suggesting that targets are distorting clinical priorities. One of the most forceful statements recently was that of the outgoing chairman of the British Medical Association, Dr. Ian Bogle, who, as the Government will be well aware, said last year:

> "The one memory that will linger long . . . is the creeping, morale sapping erosion of doctors' clinical autonomy brought about by micro-management from Whitehall which has turned the NHS I hold so dear into the most centralised public service in the free world."

He went on to say that doctors, nurses and managers were being forced to collude in widespread cheating to meet waiting time targets designed with an election in mind. Even Unison's head of health, Karen Jennings, has said:

> "Hospital staff need to be free to concentrate on clinical needs and priorities instead of chasing crude targets."

Although targets, through their demoralising effect, have frequently been cited as a reason for the failure to retain nurses, the system of star ratings, as the Minister well knows, has come in for particular criticism. Jim Johnson of the British Medical Association has made the point that the star system

> "measures little more than hospitals' ability to meet political targets and take inadequate account of quality of clinical care, or factors such as social deprivation."

The problem with star ratings is that they are a blunt measure. They are fine for measuring hotels, but not complex organisations such as hospitals, because they give patients and the medical professionals working in them, including nurses, no indication of how well their department is doing. The system saps morale, tars all departments with the same brush and means that nurses and other medical professionals are continually trying to raise standards but star ratings are getting in the way.

One could argue that all those things are necessary because otherwise we could not understand how the NHS was performing. However, it would be better to get rid of the targets and introduce a set of clinical standards, decided by the National Institute for Clinical Excellence, whereby the medical professionals themselves, rather than politicians sitting in Whitehall, decided the right level and type of care and treatment that should be provided. There is no doubt about it: Government targets are preventing money from reaching front-line services, and sapping morale. They can also interfere with the implementation of standards, which comes back to a point that my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells made.

We know that 5,000 people a year die from MRSA, and although it did not suddenly appear in 1997 but was here before that, figures suggest that it has increased significantly in recent years. Again, Government targets appear to be hindering the fight against MRSA because they are overriding the recommendations of infection control teams to close beds or wards for cleaning. That is clearly wrong, and needs to be put right.

I suggest to the Minister that a useful way of ensuring, measuring or judging the meeting of standards involves patient representation—this too returns us to one of my hon. Friend's central points. Although a tried and tested system of patient representation and monitoring is one way in which standards of nursing care can be gauged, that has been fundamentally undermined by abandoning the tried and tested system of community health councils, which operated for almost 30 years, in favour of myriad bodies.

We know that staff turnover in patients forums is high; in the first four months of this year it was some 11 per cent. Many people have commented that the forums are being starved of resources and facilities. I put it to the Minister that if we lose an efficient system of representation, we take away one of the main props—one of the main ways in which we and the nursing profession, and those outside it, can ensure that standards are being met.

In conclusion, I suggest that standards of nursing care are not necessarily falling. We believe, as do all Members, that nurses are doing a great job. However, the Government are placing obstacles in the way of improvement. For example, recent national service frameworks—the Government's chosen tool to lever up standards—have no targets attached to them. In a world without targets we would welcome that, but in a culture of targets, it spells disaster. Targets equal cash, and medical conditions that do not have targets attached will struggle.

[Mr. John Baron]

We know that modern matrons have been introduced, but we question their effectiveness on matters such as MRSA when the Government, as I have suggested, get in the way of them raising standards.

The recruitment and retention problems reflect the fact that although improvements have been made in the NHS—there is no disputing that—progress is not what it should have been, bearing in mind the money invested. We can refer to the high turnover rate, but this is not the fault of the nurses and other professionals who work in the NHS. It is the fault of the Government, who cannot see that their approach is fundamentally wrong.

Politicians must stop interfering. The Government must stop bombarding nurses and other medical staff with targets, and micro-managing the NHS. The NHS has been a political football for too long. The time has come to scrap the targets and the star-rating systems, and give all hospitals true freedom, so that they are accountable to patients and not bureaucrats. We believe that that approach will usher in an environment in which doctors and nurses, freed from political targets, will choose to stay because they can enjoy the freedom to give patients a standard of care that they can be proud of.

3.21 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): In the brief time left to me, I shall do my best to sum up the debate. I join other hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) on securing the debate. It is becoming a habit for me to respond to Wednesday afternoon debates initiated by the hon. Gentleman. As on previous occasions, I found that much of his speech was sensible and I could agree with it—but not with all of it, by any means.

I join other hon. Members in recognising that NHS nurses are at the heart of the service. They provide 80 per cent. of the care, 24 hours a day and 365 days a year, and much of what we accept as the fabric of the NHS is built on the values of nursing—such as caring, treating people with dignity and respect and combining clinical and technical expertise with the fundamentals of care that matter to patients. For patients and other members of the public, nurses are often the face of the NHS, as has been said. The care that they provide is highly valued, and the Government pay tribute to their hard work and dedication.

I shall first draw attention to some inconsistencies between the remarks of Opposition Members. I am glad that the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells recognises that we have, broadly speaking, brought about an increase in nursing numbers. That is not the impression that one would get from the remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron), who attacked us on the subject of targets.

Any organisation needs ambition and goals, and a way of telling how well it is doing. We have been instrumental in removing Whitehall controls. That has been the thrust of what we have done. In speaking about targets the hon. Gentleman failed to comment on our very good success rate, whether in the high percentage of patients who now wait only four hours—or much less—to be attended to in accident and emergency departments, the 12.2 per cent. cut in cancer mortality rates since we have been in government, or the 23.4 per cent. cut in deaths from coronary heart disease in the same period; that percentage is still growing. I could go on, but I do not have the time.

I must tackle one other point made by the hon. Member for Billericay before moving on to the much more sensible resumé of key issues given by the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells. I refer to the point about hospital treatments and productivity, which was nonsense. In considering productivity, no account is taken of walk-in centres, most primary care work, or NHS Direct. Any successful public health or prevention work does not contribute to those productivity statistics. The more successful we are on prevention and public health generally, the less productive we are by the measures being unthinkingly used by the Opposition. That is completely ridiculous.

Mr. Baron: Will the Minister give way?

Miss Johnson: No, I will not, because I have far too little time.

As we are talking about what the Government have done, I should add that there are now 77,500 more nurses, and there has been a 62 per cent. increase in training places for nursing and midwifery. That means that 21 per cent. more nurses are now caring for patients, according to our figures, which despite slight differences, are broadly in keeping with what the hon. Member for Billericay said.

I want briefly to recognise the new roles being played by nurses, although the issue did not crop up in the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) rightly commented on the number of different settings in which nursing takes place. There are now 697 nurse, midwife and health visitor consultant posts, as well as a new top clinical grade that is helping to modernise and improve services, raise standards, retain the most experienced and expert nurses in practice and strengthen clinical leadership. Nurses are also acting as a first point of contact in some of the schemes that I mentioned, such as NHS Direct and walk-in centres. Furthermore, they have a range of new responsibilities and specialist roles. My hon. Friend, with her wonderful expertise and background in nursing, described how nurses can now prescribe medicines at different levels. There is a range of new activities.

More than 18,000 of those 77,500 nurses and midwives have returned to the NHS since 1999. We must not forget nurses in primary care, whose numbers increased by nearly 18 per cent. between 1997 and 2003. In addition, vacancy rates fell to less than 3 per cent. in 2003—I am afraid that I do not have a more recent figure. Finally, the number of nurses entering training has increased dramatically—by 62 per cent. I want to say a little more about nurse training, however, because the issue exercised several hon. Members.

We obviously want to attract as many people as possible into nurse training. We also want to focus on the practical side of nursing and on those who want to take on advanced clinical roles. We need a mix of skills, as I am sure the hon. Member for Billericay will recognise. We have therefore increased the practical element of training to 50 per cent., to ensure that nurses acquire the skills needed to care for patients in the more traditional way that hon. Members have talked about. It is important to strike the right balance in preparing nurses for the future, and our nursing strategy "Making a Difference", which was published in 1999, led to developments in education that have improved nurses' practical skills. In the formal sense, the provision of practical experience is an essential element of all pre-registration education. UK pre-registration programmes require 50 per cent. theory and 50 per cent. practice, and that seems to me a pretty good balance.

On the question of maintaining people in training, we have no evidence that drop-out rates are increasing. The latest data are still being analysed. The latest complete data that we have go back to 1997–98 when there was a 20 per cent. drop-out rate. Rates vary a great deal across universities and nursing branches, but local work force development confederations are working with local education providers to reduce drop-out rates, so the issue is being considered.

On the future role of health care assistants, hon. Members and others must recognise that such people play a key supportive role, which we need in the skills mix in our hospitals. Most health care professionals are already well regulated. We issued a consultation document called "Regulation of Health Care Staff in England and Wales" on 2 March and closed the consultation period on 2 July. The consultation considered the categories of staff whose work has a direct impact on patients and who have the potential to compromise public safety if their work or behaviour falls short in any way. It set out a range of options, including full statutory regulation for such staff. We are analysing the responses to the consultation and we will decide the way forward in the light of those.

There is huge satisfaction with nursing care. We know from a study by the Royal College of Nursing that the majority of nurses—78 per cent.—are enthusiastic about their work, and 85 per cent. believe that they can provide a good quality of care. The vast majority of patients, too, are happy. The nurses enjoy doing their job, and that is recognised in all the responses that we have; 85 per cent. of the nurses in the RCN "Stepping Stones" survey agreed with the statement, "The quality of care provided where I work is good."

It is important to recognise that a new brand of nurse consultant is out there, as well as all the traditional roles that we have been talking about. Modern matrons have been mentioned, and there are now more than 3,000 of them employed in the NHS, but it is not possible to think that we could go back to the past—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must now turn our attention to the next topic of debate. I thought that a Division was about to be called on the Floor of the House, but as that has not happened, we shall start the debate.

Local Government Finance (Somerset)

3.30 pm

Mr. Adrian Flook (Taunton) (Con): May I say how pleased I am to see you in the Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker?

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

3.39 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Flook: I am delighted to have secured this important debate to voice my concerns, those of county councillors of all political parties in Somerset and those of all the people of Somerset, not just my constituents. All five of us who represent Somerset constituencies are concerned about the implications of the Government's failure to factor the figures from the 2001 census into the formula spending share.

The debate is about getting a fairer grant settlement for Somerset, particularly in view of the fact that the formula used by the Government to distribute money to local authorities is very out of date. One problem is that it is based on old census data; it uses the 1991 figures rather than those collected in 2001. That skews the formulae used to distribute the grant to each local authority. It is difficult to calculate accurately the figure by which Somerset is short-changed. The council has made a fair stab at it and calculates that it is between £3.6 million and £3.8 million.

I pay tribute to County Councillor Bob Little, the local Opposition finance spokesman, who expressed concern in the council about the situation. As a consequence, he drafted a letter that was signed at the end of July by the leaders of all three parties represented on the council. All five of us local Members of Parliament, Conservatives and Liberal Democrats, received a copy.

In the letter, the county council said that it was astounded that the Government made the decision that they did in July, when they announced that the formula spending share for the financial year 2005–06 would not use the census figures collected three years ago. The Government have estimated the loss to county councils alone as being worth some £116 million each year, as the FSS fails to take into account the depopulation of the northern metropolitan areas and the growing populations in the south-west and the south-east.

What does that mean for my constituents? In Taunton Deane there are 8,000 more people than were counted in the 1991 census, while the figure for Somerset is more than 37,000 higher than in 1991. The failure to use the 2001 figures will not even be rectified for the next funding round. That is why we are here.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister apparently has a principle—just the one, no doubt—which is clearly stated:

> "The Data to be used in grant distribution should be the most up-to-date available".

I am sure that the Minister will comment on what he considers to be the most up to date. However, we all know that the Government are using data from 1991 as the basis for the FSS. That means that the funding for services based on demography and socio-economic factors reflects the situation at the beginning of the last decade, rather that that at the beginning of this decade. In the past 13 years, Somerset's population has increased, but the people who have moved into the area tend to be older than those who were there before, and their requirements are different. That is not recognised if one uses the 1991 census figures.

As the population has grown larger, so have the towns. The constituency of Taunton is somewhat larger than it was 15 years ago. That means that the relative sparsity factor in Somerset has increased for those in the rural areas as well. That, in turn, means that we probably do not get the funding that we ought to for rural schools or rural transport. The upshot is that there is inaccurate and inadequate funding for services. All of us know from our constituency mailbags that authorities throughout the country are feeling the squeeze of funding pressures over and above those caused by the fact that the latest census figures are not being used.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this important debate. Is he aware in the past 30 years or so of any precedent for a Government waiting such a prolonged period to incorporate census data into funding figures? Is there not a serious danger that those delays will lead to unfairness not only for Somerset but for county councils throughout the country?

Mr. Flook: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point about precedent. If the Minister does not have the information with him today I would be interested to know at a later date what happened with previous census figures and how quickly they were implemented.

We would all admit that the FSS and its predecessor became even more complicated despite the fact that in the late 1990s the Government said that they were going to simplify the system. Since then, computer modelling has become much more sophisticated and the speed with which answers to questions should be found has increased. As the Minister will find out, and as a number of us were aware in the mid-1990s, a lot of juggling goes on to find the most advantageous solution to the FSS that suits as few councils as possible. It would be interesting for the Minister to write to us about what happened in the early '90s, '80s and '70s, and before that if possible, if he does not have the answer now.

The population in the south-west has grown, and the population mix has changed in that there are more elderly people, particularly in Somerset, which has led to inaccurate and inadequate funding for services. When it first became apparent that the Government were unlikely to use figures from the 2001 census and would be sticking with the 1991 figures, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister said:

> "The ODPM might not have sufficient resources to conduct the analytical work"— that is very much Whitehall, mandarin-speak—

> "with sufficient vigour without"— and here it sounds like it really has been written by Sir Humphrey—

> "jeopardising the overall timetable."

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): Is my hon. Friend amazed, as I am, at the ODPM's pathetic excuse that it does not have enough officials to deal with the update, when the same Department is spending a great deal of money and management time on engaging with the unwanted and unnecessary regional assemblies? We suffer from one such talking shop in the south-west. Does he agree that if the Government redeployed some of the civil servants trying to impose an extra layer of bureaucracy on us in the shape of regional assemblies and made them work on updating those figures, we might have a more equitable funding settlement and meet his quite legitimate concerns?

Mr. Flook: My right hon. Friend makes a good point. Just the other day, he was showing me an advertisement in the local newspaper for six new jobs to help to back up the regional assembly. That is funded by the taxpayer, and the money has no doubt come from the ODPM. It is fair to make the point that money is being allocated to the regional assemblies, but I do not wish to go down that avenue, as we are not here to debate that subject. However, if that money had been reallocated to number-crunching civil servants, we might have received the figures more quickly.

The Minister will say that that is in fact down to the Treasury, and I will come on to that point, but we are discussing how £46 billion is allocated—or misallocated, as the figures are seemingly so out of date—throughout the country. That misallocation is hardly surprising, as the figures are 10 years out of date. The Government say that it is all right because, according to the letters that the Minister sent to Members of Parliament, there is a freeze on the formulae so that the ODPM can provide every council with funding stability. That freeze locks in the advantages for those who benefit, but it locks in the disadvantages for those who suffer. Those who get too much continue with the luxury of having too much, while the others can just waddle along calm in the knowledge that they are being officially short-changed by central Government.

There is still hope that the Government may find some resources to crunch the numbers in time for the figures from the 2011 census, but we now know from the announcement made on 21 July that they will definitely not be ready for next year.

So, let us think about the amount by which council tax will have to rise in 2005–06, the next financial year. In Somerset, council tax has risen considerably in recent years because of a combination of Government failure and perhaps—how can I put this?—the way in which the council has been run. In the forthcoming increases, at least 2 per cent. of the rise that the taxpayers of Somerset will have to pay can be put down to what can be described at best as an administrative failure and at worst as a political ploy by the Government to help their friends in the north.

Is that a coincidence, just ahead of next year's election? The Minister shakes his head. Is it a coincidence that the new figures with all the adjustments will not be needed because there has been a freeze, or is it by design? However much the Minister may protest, he must know that perception is everything in politics, and public opinion on the matter in Somerset, and I am sure in the south-west as a whole, is not on his side.

I am sure that the Minister will tell me that to incorporate the 2001 figures into the formulae is not a simple task, but what Government function is? He will tell us that if he were to incorporate the figures, it would break the funding freeze and cause large changes to the distribution. That is precisely what the people of Somerset, the county council and the district councils need and want. The Government are putting off a proper response to an ongoing trend. I am worried for the Minister's role. It is logical and it should be obvious that when the Government do get around to using the new census figures from 2001 in the formulae, the end result will be even further removed from where they would be if they used them for next year. But then again, there is unlikely to be an election the year after next.

We know that the 21 July announcement was made three weeks before the end of the Government's public consultation on local government finance amending reports. It is fair to ask the Minister why he had a consultation so early in the process if there was no intention of taking any notice of it.

Furthermore, the Government claim that they did not have a full set of the 2001 data because the Office for National Statistics released the data only in stages. I am sure that that will be the crux of the Minister's defence. What representations did the ODPM make to the Treasury—not because the Treasury is the paymaster, but because it is the Department responsible for the census—about when all the figures from the 2001 census would be available? I hope that it, too, is not involved in the largesse that ends up with the metropolitan counties of the north doing so well.

If the figures were to be used, the south-west would gain £35 million and the south-east £49 million. London would lose £50 million. Yorkshire and the Humber would be £14 million lighter, and, surprise, surprise—I am sorry to say this Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I know that you represent a constituency in the area—the north-east would be £24 million the poorer.

So, the shire counties are £116 million worse off, the south-west £35 million and Somerset £3.8 million. That would fill in a lot of potholes in Somerset's roads, buy a lot of library books, and provide quite a number of teachers and a lot more care for the elderly. The county council has called it incompetence. As a Member of Parliament, I do not think that I would go that far. However, householders in Somerset say that the £18 that they are being robbed of is yet another stealth tax. Whatever it is, Somerset deserves a full and proper explanation for that shortfall.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): I congratulate the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Flook) on securing the debate. It provides a useful opportunity to discuss the issue of using the 2001 census data in the local government finance settlement for 2005–06. I welcome the opportunity that he has given us to expand on the issues that have been raised by a number of local authorities in shire areas and their representatives. He has expressed particular concern about funding for local authorities in Somerset and about the decision not to use the 2001 census data. I am very aware of the strength of feeling about the issue, as he has just been describing it, in Somerset and other shire areas.

Before I comment on the specific issues raised, it may be helpful if I provide some background on the system for distributing grant to local authorities, and on the improvements that we have made to the funding of local government since we took office. In local government finance settlements since 1997 we have increased the amount of Government grant given to local authorities by £19.1 billion. That is a 30 per cent. increase in real terms—above inflation—and compares with a 7 per cent. cut in the four years before 1997–98, when the hon. Gentleman's party was in government. The spending review 2004 goes further: it provides significant and continued extra investment in local government, with £7.2 billion more than this financial year in general grant for programmes by 2007–08. That is an annual increase of 2.7 per cent. in real terms.

I admire the hon. Gentleman for coming to the House to plead for more money for his authority in Somerset, as the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) and the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) have done for their authorities. I have no doubt that on many occasions over the coming months, Opposition Members will stand up to demand more money for their local authorities. As well as coming to the House to demand extra resources, the hon. Member for Taunton might want to have a quiet word with the shadow Chancellor, who has announced that if the Conservatives get into power, there will be a cash freeze for local authorities—not a 2.7 per cent. increase above inflation, but a cash freeze. Perhaps he and his colleagues should have a debate within their party about the impact that such a decision would have on services and council tax increases in their areas.

Of course, our priority funding areas have been education and personal social services. The latest settlement, in 2004–05, is a cash increase of 6.9 per cent. for those services. There can be little argument that we have provided significantly greater investment since 1997–98, and there is general agreement that recent settlements have offered welcome improvements in the money going to local authorities. The average full grant increase for Somerset since 2002–03 is 6.2 per cent. Inflation was way below that. Somerset county council then chose to increase the council tax by 10.2 per cent., which is regrettable for the taxpayers of Somerset, but at least they got a good deal from the Government with the grant. Taunton Deane borough council had a 3.9 per cent. increase in grant, while West Somerset district council had a 5.4 per cent. increase.

I now turn to the settlement specifically for Somerset county council. Somerset has benefited from the extra money of which I spoke. In 2004–05, it received an extra £287 million in general grant. That is an increase of £16.5 million, or 6.1 per cent., on a like-for-like basis compared with 2003–04. Over the past seven years, we have provided Somerset county council with an average annual increase in general grant of 4.8 per cent. in cash terms. That is not what I would describe as a case of Somerset being short-changed in the way in which the hon. Gentleman alleged.

The current grant distribution system was introduced in 2003–04 after a full-scale review and consultation. The system is designed specifically to take into account the relative needs of different authorities, and to determine grant on that basis. The general principle behind the calculation of grant allocations is to provide a basic amount per client—per primary school pupil, for example—or per kilometre of road and then to add top-ups to recognise the extra costs incurred in certain areas. The main top-ups are for deprivation and area costs, but a wide range of factors determines the amount of grant that individual authorities receive.

The hon. Gentleman is right to say that, in order to provide stability to local authorities, it was announced in the 2001 White Paper that following the introduction of the new system in 2003–04, no further changes would be made to the formulae until 2006–07 at the earliest. That decision has been known about since 2001, so the 2004–05 settlement was made on the same formulae as last year, 2003–04, and we intend to maintain the freeze for 2005–06.

Although we have frozen the grant distribution formulae, something that local authorities were pleased about because it gave them stability and certainty over a three-year period, we have endeavoured to use the most up-to-date data available each year for grant calculations. However, we have updated the data used in settlements only where it has been possible to do so without changing the underlying formula. I stress that point. Let me give examples of that, because it has been put around by so many shire authorities in a way that has been unhelpful and inaccurate, and I should like to get it absolutely clear. To give an example of where the data have been upgraded, when we calculate the older people's social services FSS each year, we use updated figures for the population aged 65 and over in each area, and we use the number of older people that each authority supports in care homes. We also update the proportion of older people claiming income support or disability living allowance in each area. Those are two of the deprivation indicators in that FSS formula.

However, where data change greatly it is generally not possible to use them to calculate FSS without amending the underlying formula. Two census-based deprivation indicators from the children's social services formula illustrate that point. Information from the new census tells us that the number of children living in single-parent households increased by 45 per cent. in England between 1991 and 2001 and that the proportion of children living in flats varied widely across the country, falling by 38 per cent. in the north-west but standing still in London and the south-east. Given those large changes in the data, it is clear that the relationship that we observe between the relative need for children's social services and the 1991 census data will not hold when the new census data are applied. In short, we would no longer be confident that the children's social services FSS was being directed to the authorities with the highest need.

I have spoken at length about those examples to show why sometimes we use certain data, and sometimes we do not use other data because they would necessitate amending the fundamental underlying formula, and we have a policy decision to freeze the formulae for three years to give certainty and stability. I understand the hon. Gentleman's desire to see the 2001 census data incorporated into the formulae for the grant system as soon as possible. I have given examples of where we do that and where we do not, and why. However, I want him to understand that we have had to make difficult decisions, of which those examples are just two, on whether to include the latest data available—the 2001 census data—or retain the formula freeze and provide the stability that we believe authorities require. Having balanced those arguments, we decided not to use the 2001 census data in the 2005–06 settlement. That decision was announced on 21 July.

Having reached our conclusion, we felt that it was better on balance to announce the decision as early as possible to enable authorities to make informed decisions for their 2005–06 budgets. I know that the consultation exercise was still ongoing at that time, but we decided to move early once we made that decision, to give local authorities more time to take the changes into account.

I am aware of concerns expressed by the County Councils network that the new data were not incorporated into this year's 2004–05 settlement because of lack of prioritisation of Government resources. I understand that that is the point that the hon. Members for Taunton and for Yeovil were debating earlier. In fact, we could not have incorporated the new data in 2004–05—this year—even if it were technically possible to do so because we did not have the full set of 2001 census data. In fact, we received the last set of data that we needed from the ONS only on 21 October, a few days ago. I therefore hope that I have been able to set that matter straight for the hon. Gentlemen.

As I have already said, it would be technically incorrect simply to introduce the data without first amending the statistical models underlying the FSS formulae.

Mr. Laws: Is there any technical reason why the Minister could not incorporate the 2001 census data into the 2005–06 settlement?

Phil Hope: I have already explained that where the data would affect the underlying formula, we will not incorporate them because we have chosen to freeze the formulae for the three years 2003–04, 2004–05 and 2005–06; otherwise there would be unintended consequences—the money would go to the wrong place. Changing the formulae in that way would end the freeze, which is designed to create the funding stability that local authorities require. Further research is being undertaken on the formula changes needed to incorporate the 2001 census data into the whole FSS for several services, in particular personal social services and the police. That research should conclude in time to allow us to introduce the 2001 data in 2006–07, not 2005–06. As the research is ongoing, it is not possible at this time to estimate what amount of grant any authority would receive if the 2001 data were to be incorporated in 2005–06.

In the few minutes that remain, let me just say a few words about the figures that the hon. Member for Taunton mentioned. He said that Somerset will lose £3.8 million because we are not using the 2001 census data to calculate the 2005–6 settlement. It is not actually that easy to say what the impact of the data would be, or to come up with a figure. I understand that the figure of £3.8 million—indeed, the hon. Gentleman mentioned £116 million as the gross figure for all shire counties—was taken from a technical paper that was discussed at official level by the settlement working group. That paper illustrated what would happen if we were simply to use the 2001 census data in the current formulae. It was also based on only a partial update of data, as not all the data were then available.

Local authority experts, including the County Councils Network, agreed that that was the wrong thing to do. Therefore, the £3.8 million and £116 million that the hon. Gentleman quoted do not accurately reflect the effect of updating the census data in the funding formulae. I regret that the figures simply are not accurate, although they seem a useful explanation for what many have dubbed the missing millions.

Mr. Flook: In which case, what is the figure?

Phil Hope: The point is that we cannot give figures at present, as they are being calculated. The scaremongering by the shire authorities—and the Members who make their case in this Chamber—simply will not do, when they themselves have been at the table to discuss these matters.

We have worked with local government to establish the best way to use the new census in the funding formulae. It is clear that incorporating the new census data will require formula changes, particularly for the social services and police, that would best be made as part of the formula review that we are undertaking.

Time is not on my side, so I shall just conclude by saying that, despite the robustness of the debate this afternoon, I fully understand the points that the hon. Gentleman raised. The Government have carefully considered the case for incorporating the 2001 census data in the settlement for next year, but in order to provide authorities with the funding stability that they have welcomed overall, we decided to maintain the promised formula freeze next year. This has been a good opportunity to debate the matter. It builds on the work of the officials' settlement working group, in which all the issues are discussed, perhaps in a slightly more collaborative way than we have managed today. We shall continue to work towards incorporating the 2001 census data in the settlement for 2006–07 as part of our wider review of the distribution formulae.

Cash Machine Charges

4.9 pm

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab): May I, through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, thank Mr. Speaker for granting me this debate?

I raise this issue because of a series of concerns. One third of the cash machine network in the United Kingdom now charges people a fee for accessing their own money, and the proportion of fee-charging cash machines in the network is increasing. On current trends, we are not far from the point where the majority of cash-dispensing machines will charge.

Charges vary, but they are not less than £1 and are often more than that, and as a proportion of the average cash withdrawal they can represent a significant deduction. There is evidence to suggest an increasing concentration of such machines in lower income areas, and my major concern is that there is no robust code or regulation in place telling the customer what is going on. In other words, there is inadequate transparency in the industry and it should be addressed, given the trends. People should object to paying for the privilege of collecting their own money.

There is something ironic about the current situation. If my current account in the bank is in the black, I can go into a bank branch—an expensive building—go to a teller, who is employed at some expense to the bank, and withdraw cash from my account for free. However, if I go to a cash-dispensing machine in the street, where no expensive building or member of staff is involved, it is increasingly likely that I shall be charged for using that machine to do exactly the same thing. The hole in the wall has become the hole in my pocket.

There is currently much debate about the reform of gambling laws. If I engage with a gaming machine I know that I may lose my money, or I may win—I take a gamble. However, if I use a cash machine that charges, I will always lose. It is guaranteed to drain my account every time. According to a Which survey, two thirds of people do not expect to be charged by a convenience cash machine. I am beginning to wonder why there is so much fuss about slot machines, when there are already 20,000 one-armed bandits on Britain's high streets.

I have nothing against any company wanting to get into this business and make money out of it. I am not asking the Government to ban charges for accessing cash, or asking banks or finance companies to offer a free good. They are in business and they have the right to try to make money, and a network of cash machines costs something to operate. However, the consumer also has the right to fair trading, honesty and transparency. Consumers have choice as their weapon, but they can deploy it only if they have information, and they will have it only if those they are trading with are transparent about the deal on offer. That is where there is a big gap, and we need to work to close it.

The big high street banks are not the main culprits. For the most part, their machines, often in their branches, are free at the point of use with no charge to the customer withdrawing cash—a service that is funded by interchange fees exchanged between the banks. The main problem is with the cash machines owned and operated by other companies, such as Hanco,

[Mr. James Plaskitt]

Moneybox, Cardpoint and Travelex. Hanco has the largest share of the market with 26 per cent. and Moneybox is second with a 15 per cent. share. Since Moneybox started in this business in 1999, it has raised its average charge by 60 per cent. Cardpoint currently has a 14% share of the market and has a declared strategy—it can be found in its annual report—of increasing the number of machines and increasing charges per withdrawal. A minority of the total cash withdrawn via the hole-in-the-wall operations is issued by these companies' machines. However, that is where the main problem lies and it could easily become a more significant problem unless appropriate codes or regulations are put into place.

Let me give a simple illustration of the problem. On Monday, I went to Leicester square. In between the Empire cinema and Ben and Jerry's ice cream parlour, there is a cash machine that prominently displays a Link logo. I inserted my card and went through the usual on-screen steps with which we are familiar. After the fourth step—the last before it would issue the cash—a message popped up saying that I would be charged £1.50 for the transaction. As I was attempting to withdraw £20, that would have meant a 7.5 per cent. deduction from my cash, so I aborted the transaction.

However, let us consider the problem. The machine was registered as a Link machine, which most people understand to be a free network. The Travelex sign was tucked away out of obvious sight. There was no prominent sign on that machine to tell me that it would charge; in fact, there was no sign at all.

When I began using the machine, there was no message to warn me that I would be charged. How realistic is it in normal circumstances to imagine that people will pull out of the transaction, as I did, having got that far? They have already queued, there are probably other people behind them, they want the cash, and they are in a rush. That is simply unfair trading. That machine belongs to Travelex, which cannot possibly argue that it is a convenience machine, serving only a limited clientele, and that there must be a need to charge.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I am interested by my hon. Friend's argument. Could he describe the difference, as he sees it, between a convenience machine and the one in the case he has just outlined? I am trying to get clear in my head the differences in definition between a convenience machine and the one in Leicester square, next to Ben and Jerry's.

Mr. Plaskitt: To some extent, all the machines are convenience machines. The phrase has come into use to refer, by and large, to machines that are not located in branches of the main banks. That is what the term has come to mean, but it covers a collection of different locations and sites. I can help my hon. Friend further by pointing out that just a few metres away from that machine, in Leicester square, is a row of cash machines owned by NatWest that are not in a branch but all offer free withdrawal.

Leicester square is obviously a busy area. There is a very high footfall, to use the jargon, so Travelex's uncommunicative machine is just a cynical bit of consumer exploitation. In its briefing, Link says:

> "You will only be charged . . . if you use a 'convenience' cash machine. These are found in locations that would not normally justify the cost of installing a cash machine because fewer people are expected to use them".

That is what Link says should be the case with convenience machines, but it is patently the case that in Leicester square, one of the busiest locations one could find, Link's policy is being breached by that Travelex machine. I do not believe that it is the only such example.

If we move away from Leicester square and London altogether, we can find even more interesting examples. Let us travel instead to Liverpool, to the L5 postal district, one of the poorest in the United Kingdom. In the core of that area, nine of the 10 available cash machines charge. Or we could go to Glasgow, and the G34 postal district—six of the 10 machines in that core area charge. By contrast, in some of the more prosperous parts of the country, such as Fleet, in Hampshire, in the GU51 postal area, we find that eight of the 10 core machines are free. In the RG40 postal area of Wokingham, seven of the 10 core machines are free.

There is a financial exclusion issue arising out of the conduct of those companies. Where bank branches have largely gone from an area, people are left increasingly dependent on so-called convenience machines. They are incurring the charges, which fall disproportionately on customers with lower incomes. Benefits are increasingly paid directly into bank accounts. If a mother in the L5 area withdraws the money for her child benefit via a so-called convenience cash machine, 5 per cent. of it will end up in the hands of the automated teller machine provider.

There is also an element of age discrimination. Once a child has reached the age of 14, he or she can obtain a cash card—not a cheque account or a credit card, just a cash card. In general, children of that age will be drawing out very small amounts, so the £10 cash withdrawal on the Saturday morning trip to the shops could very well incur a charge of £1.50 if taken from a convenience machine. That is a 15 per cent. deduction from the young person's cash. Those customers do not have many other available sources from which to obtain their cash and may well be less aware of their options.

A pattern of disadvantage begins to emerge and will only worsen if the current behavioural trends in the industry are left to continue. The signs are that they will, which is why I want to bring this issue to the attention of the Chamber. Many of the banks are disposing of their cash machine network—that is, machines outside their branches. HBOS, for example, sold its non-branch machines to Cardpoint. All those machines used to be free, but they are unlikely to remain so. Abbey has also sold off part of its network to Moneybox, so free machines—in this case, those in petrol stations—are now becoming charging machines. The banks can still be involved even when the machines are sold off to other operators. RBS, for example, owns Hanco.

It is objectionable to have to pay for the privilege of collecting my own money, but I accept that those in business will see this as an opportunity to make money.

As I said in my opening remarks, however, I as a consumer have or should have some power in this relationship. At the moment, however, too many consumers are being deprived of those powers. Action is necessary to restore a level playing field.

What intervention is there in this relationship? The system is currently governed by the Link network, which applies a voluntary code, part of which I just quoted. The code quite rightly indicates that cash-dispensing machines that charge should say so, but, as the Leicester square example showed us—it is not the only one—the code is not worth the paper it is written on because it is not policed.

I want customers to be able to vote with their feet and walk away from charging machines wherever possible. That will be possible only if there is greater transparency about what those machines do. I want an enforceable code that will protect the free parts of the network, such as those operated by Nationwide. That will give consumers the power to which they are entitled. The code should say that machines must display a clear and prominent warning that they charge. This warning must be on the machine itself, not only on the screen, and it should not be tucked away or disguised. After all, if a small cigarette packet can contain a large, clear sign saying, "Smoking kills", surely a much larger cash machine can display a sign saying, "This machine charges."

Wherever possible, the amount of the charge should also be given equal prominence. The same charge notice needs to be included on the promotional signage associated with that machine, not just on the machine itself. All non-financial transactions must remain free of any charge.

This is not yet a massive problem, but I suggest to my hon. Friend the Minister that it is already significant. The trends are worrying, and are clearly established. For example, the number of fee-charging machines has increased by 40 per cent. in only the past six months. Last year, 63 per cent. of the 5,600 new ATMs installed in this country charged fees. Very soon, there will be more fee-charging machines than free ones in this country.

Those who are trying to maintain a free and convenient cash machine network are under siege from others in the industry who are anxious to charge us for accessing our own money. The voluntary code is not working, which is probably unsurprising, given the big banks' dominance over the Link network. I therefore say to my hon. Friend that it is time for the Department, which does act in the consumer's interest, to enforce fair play.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt) on securing this debate on an important subject, which is a matter of concern. I thank him for the work that he is doing, not only as a constituency Member, but as a member of the Treasury Committee. The matter that we are debating is one of several being considered by the Select Committee and I am pleased to see the Chairman present today. I am grateful for the opportunity to respond.

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton) (Lab/Co-op): I thank the Minister, on behalf of the Treasury Committee, for his interest in these consumer issues. The Committee will have a couple of hearings on this topic in December; no doubt an invitation will be winging its way to him.

Mr. Sutcliffe: How can I resist such an invitation? It was my privilege as a very new and junior Minister to appear before the Committee last year. I gave extensive commitments, and I know that the Committee has been considering them, so I look forward to returning. The number of serious issues that it is considering, the detail of its scrutiny and its use of witness hearings show the House working to maximum effect. That work, together with the Government's examination of the issues in the wider context, will, I hope, enable us to reach the right outcomes for consumers, our constituents and the industry. There are many in the industry who operate fairly and appropriately, but we need to think about other aspects of the matter.

Protocol forbids me to mention what may or may not be in the Queen's Speech, but if we are fortunate enough to learn from it that there will be a consumer credit Bill, that will provide an opportunity to consider the issues and what can be done about them.

Cash machine charges affect everyone in the UK. Such machines are the first port of call for many of us. As my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington said, they have supplanted the traditional counter as the mechanism of choice for withdrawing money. Many significant changes have been made to the system in the past few years. I welcome many of those developments, including the removal, in most cases, of charges to customers for using machines—notwithstanding the issues raised by my hon. Friend—the increasing transparency where charges are applied, and the wider deployment of machines. We can be sure, however, that the changes have provided, and can continue to provide, real benefit to consumers. The Government are committed to ensuring that consumers get a fair deal, value for money and greater choice. We see that as good not only for consumers but for British businesses.

My hon. Friend will know that many of the changes to cash machines result from the March 2000 report by Don Cruikshank on competition levels in UK banking. In that context, Cruikshank examined the UK machine network, Link. I want to say a few words about the report, which had a huge impact on the industry. It found that many consumers faced charges levied by their card issuer and, sometimes, additional charges levied by the cash machine provider. Those charges were not, in many cases, made clear when the cash withdrawal was made. The requirement to be an issuer of cards in order to operate cash machines was a real barrier to entry to the market.

Following the report, Link made several changes to its rules. I am interested in my hon. Friend's interpretation of those rules. Link opened its membership to non-bank organisations. It required that all charges, whether applied by the cash machine owner or the card issuer, should be notified to the customer by means of an on-screen message at the time of the transaction and that customers should always have the option to cancel the transaction without charge.

Link also banned double charging, which means that card issuers will not charge customers for cash withdrawal at a machine that attracts a convenience fee, and a machine will not apply a further charge to a cash withdrawal where a customer's card issuers charge a cash advance fee. Link has made those welcome changes to its rules, and the Government believe that they have had a positive impact on the market.

Mr. Plaskitt: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's response, but he has just referred to the Link document calling for information to be given to customers using cash machines "at the time of the transaction". That is a very vague phrase. In the case that I cited, the machine in Leicester square, the time of the transaction is the last moment before it issues the cash. A lot more activity goes on before that. Does my hon. Friend agree that the customer needs to know from the outset that they are to be charged, not at the very last moment?

Mr. Sutcliffe: Given my experience in the Treasury Committee, my hon. Friend will not be surprised if I do not respond immediately with my personal opinion. I am sure he will appreciate that in these debates it is important to consider in detail the information that hon. Members give us and respond accordingly. By happy coincidence, my officials are meeting Link representatives tomorrow, and I shall ask them to take up the issues raised by my hon. Friend in the debate. I undertake to respond to him and to the Treasury Committee in due course.

On the whole, it is extremely good news that the vast majority of customers do not have to pay to withdraw cash when they use a cash machine that is not owned by their bank. According to recent Link figures, about 97 per cent. of all cash machine transactions are now free.

Mr. Plaskitt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way again so soon. Does he acknowledge that even though a charge is incurred on a small percentage of all the cash being dispensed, if we take the figure that he has just mentioned, £3.6 billion in cash is dispensed on which fees are charged? Will my hon. Friend bear in mind the fact that that amount is 48 per cent. higher than the figure for the year before, which is a fast growth in the section of the network that charges?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. In the spirit of how we progress on these matters, he will understand that a Minister's response comes from the advice given him by officials. I know that my hon. Friend will appreciate that I, as Minister with responsibility for consumers, want transparency, to ensure that the consumer is not treated unfairly. My hon. Friend was right to make the point about percentages and what they mean in real terms.

Our information is that Link rules state that customers must be warned of the charge and given the option of cancelling the transaction. They stipulate that an on-screen message detailing all charges will appear before the transaction is completed, and the customer can pull out of it without charge. I recognise that there is some discussion about when that point is reached.

I understand that Link members have also agreed that a sign saying:

> "This machine may charge you for Link cash withdrawals" will be clearly visible to card holders before the card is inserted in a cash-charging machine, either by a notice on the machine or an upfront screen message, at the discretion of the cash machine owner. My hon. Friend knows of our work on transparency and advertising; the sign must be very clear and the consumer must be aware of it.

On the whole, I welcome these developments and encourage the widespread adherence to the principles. It is important that consumers have relevant, correct and transparent information in order to make informed decisions and avoid being misled, which is the key issue.

As my hon. Friend said, fees are still charged in some cases, such as the use of store, credit or charge cards, when the card issuer charges a cash advance fee, or the use of non-bank cash machines, which are often called convenience machines. Increased competition in the market has led to a growth in the number of cash machines, both those provided by the banks and those provided by non-bank operators. Most non-bank or convenience machines are found in locations that would not otherwise justify the cost of installing a machine, and I was interested to hear what my hon. Friend said about the machine in Leicester square. The issue about charging in areas where convenience machines are likely to be—garages, pubs and stores—involves the number of transactions. Many of us, if we find that we need cash but would otherwise not have access to it, are prepared to pay for that opportunity of access.

The recent increase in the number of convenience machines is a benefit resulting from the changes to open up the market. Competitive markets provide the best means of ensuring that the economy's resources are put to their best use by encouraging enterprise and efficiency, and widening choice. Where markets work well, they provide strong incentives for good performance, encouraging firms to improve productivity, to reduce prices and to innovate, and they reward consumers with lower prices, higher quality and wider choice.

Allowing non-banks to join Link has allowed new operators to fill a niche and to deploy cash machines in many locations where there had previously not been a machine. The Government believe that the growth in the number of non-bank cash machines has led to an increase in choice for consumers and is driven by demand from consumers. The machines provide access to cash in locations that were not previously served, and the operator must cover the cost of providing that service. It is important to remember that prior to the change in the Link rules to allow that to happen there would have been no cash machines in most of those locations. Despite the growth in the number of non-bank cash machines, I have been told that they account for only 3 per cent. of transactions, notwithstanding the point about the value of that 3 per cent.

As my hon. Friend knows, the Government are committed to promoting financial inclusion and I would be concerned if poor people were more likely to pay for cash machine use. The Government have acted to make the benefits of banking services more widely available; I will say something about that in a moment. I would be very concerned if the rules on the transparency of charging information were not being properly adhered to or enforced.

I must now say a few words about the regulation of the industry. The provision of payment services, including the deployment ofATMs, is not regulated by the Government. However, that is not to say that there are no safeguards in place. The amount of money that flows through the UK's payment systems—Link is one, albeit one through which relatively small amounts of money flow—means that the Government must take an interest in the possibility of risks to banks or to financial stability. Most of the participants in the UK's main payment systems are banks, which are authorised by the Financial Services Authority. The non-banks that are members of Link are not FSA-authorised, and the Bank of England has responsibility for overseeing payment systems as part of its wider responsibility for financial stability.

The Government have no plans to make the provision of payment services a regulated activity. We do not believe that the risks posed are such that the costs of regulation would be outweighed by the benefits. However, the European Commission is currently developing a directive for a new legal framework for payments, which is likely to create a pan-European regulatory regime for payment services. The Government are currently engaged in ensuring that that regulation is both focused and proportionate. Although the Government do not support regulation of the provision of payment services, we believe that it is important that the market functions efficiently and that the competition is driving good service for consumers.

In conclusion, it is good news for consumers that most do not now pay for using cash machines, but I understand the points made by my hon. Friend, and I will ask my officials to discuss them with Link at the meeting tomorrow. It is important to me that there is transparency and fairness and that consumers are not misled. The work of the Treasury Committee, in conjunction with what we are trying to achieve in my Department and the work of the Treasury, will offer a better deal for consumers. The work that my hon. Friend has done means that consumers will be protected, and I am grateful to him for raising the matter today.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-one minutes to Five o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 28 October 2004

[SIR ALAN HASELHURST in the Chair]

Antisocial Behaviour

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We shall conduct the debate with the flexibility that has become the characteristic of cross-cutting questions in Westminster Hall. Nevertheless, it will be helpful if hon. Members are brief with their supplementary questions and Ministers are brief with their answers, so that the debate can flow as fully as possible. That is particularly important if we are to deal with as many questions as have been tabled, but I will endeavour to ensure that there is the proper breadth of discussion where that is needed, rather than regard question 17 as a winning post that must be reached at all costs.

Oral Answers to Questions

The Government were asked—

Enforcement

2.30 pm

1. Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): If the Government will make a statement on the enforcement of antisocial behaviour orders. [193542]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): The purpose of an antisocial behaviour order is to stop antisocial behaviour. Whereas a prosecution usually deals with a single offence, an ASBO can deal with a series of low-level, persistent incidents of damage that is done to individuals and communities by people who think that anything goes and that they can get away with it. Enforcement is crucial in giving the clear signal that the police, local authorities and the courts are serious and determined to act to restore confidence to local communities. The evidence shows that ASBOs succeed in reducing antisocial behaviour not only by the person who is the subject of the order but by others in the same community. The importance of enforcement has been stressed in guidance to magistrates.

Mr. Luff: I thank the Minister for that answer. I am sure that he agrees with me that the number of ASBOs issued is not a measure of success, and that diversionary routes away from offending behaviour during the ASBO process are what really matter. I am also sure that he will endorse the efforts of West Mercia constabulary and its partners to divert 16 and 17-year-old boys and girls away from their offending patterns of behaviour. However, if an ASBO is issued, it is crucial that it be enforced properly and thoroughly. Does the Minister share the concern expressed to me by police officers in West Mercia that the lack of secure accommodation to house those who have breached ASBOs could lead to a lack of respect for the ASBO process?

Alun Michael: First, let me say that yes, change of behaviour is the crucial element. Stopping people damaging the lives of others is what ASBOs are all about. Secondly, the number of orders that have been issued—more than 3,000—is a sign of success. The number issued is accelerating because the orders are being used more consistently and rapidly in appropriate circumstances. That is good news. Thirdly, the hon. Gentleman is wrong about secure accommodation. If we simply continued with a traditional approach and failed to intervene to stop people carrying on with activities that damage individuals, families and communities, we would need more secure accommodation. The fact is that ASBOs succeed in reducing the level of such activity.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): This is the first opportunity for cross-cutting questions on antisocial behaviour. Is it not all the more astonishing, therefore, that the Government's major announcement on the evidential basis on which antisocial behaviour orders have been working, on which we could have based our questions, will be not be made until 3.30 pm—the precise moment when these questions finish? May I put to the Minister one specific question on a matter that I believe will be part of that announcement? It is said that the Government plan to extend applications for ASBOs to community groups. Is that true? If so, how will that work, how will evidence be collected and what will be the legal advice to community groups?

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman is nearly as bad as the press in anticipating answers to questions that have not yet been asked and in looking to announcements that are being made in an appropriate way. The fact is that there are plenty of questions for him to ask about the performance of ASBOs and their success. Of course, Conservative and Liberal Democrat Members have opposed the actions taken by the Government to tackle and intervene on antisocial behaviour. It is the Government's intention to continue using the orders and associated measures to tackle antisocial behaviour and stop it. It is a pity that Opposition Members do not support us.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): The concentration of ASBOs is not uniform throughout the country. Some areas are putting them into effect to a great extent; some have not issued any. So far as I am aware, Cambridgeshire has implemented and put in place only one order. What do the Government intend to do to ensure that ASBOs are put in place throughout the country?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): The hon. Gentleman is correct to say that in parts of the country there have been huge successes, and wide application of the use of ASBOs, and in others that has not happened. That is why we want to share good practice and why the "Together" campaign, the academies and the helpline for practitioners, whether in the police or the local authority, are important. As a result, if someone is thinking of using any of the measures on antisocial behaviour, they can get their questions answered clearly and quickly. Importantly, they can find out best practice from elsewhere. Every Member of Parliament has an opportunity to ensure that best practice is being implemented in their area. I am sure that the antisocial behaviour unit will be willing to assist the hon. Gentleman.

Alun Michael: May I add that if hon. Members consider their constituency experiences they will find many that are positive? In Cardiff in my constituency, for instance, ASBOs were not used for a long time, but since they have been used, with the help of the police, the local authority and an extremely good crime reduction officer, each of the communities where they have been used has benefited.

Mr. Heath: Am I really to understand from the right hon. Gentleman's earlier answer that it is improper, in the House of Commons during cross-cutting questions on antisocial behaviour, to ask about the future operation of ASBOs, because the proper place for doing so is at a press conference later this afternoon? Is that what he is saying?

Alun Michael: No, of course it is not. That is one of the silliest contributions that I have heard from an Opposition Member—and there is competition on that. I said that there were plenty of questions that hon. Members could ask about the application of ASBOs and their success and the way we are tackling and reducing antisocial behaviour across the country—items in which the hon. Gentleman appears not to be interested. He is interested only in the technicalities and in scoring debating points.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): Obviously, we all hope that antisocial behaviour orders do not have to be enforced, because we hope that they will be observed. However, we understand from the Government that approximately one third of antisocial behaviour orders are breached. Will the Minister help me on this: when she says that they are breached, does she mean that there is a report of a breach taking place, or that in one third of cases a breach has been taken before the magistrates court and adjudged to be a breach? As she will appreciate, those two things could be rather different. A proper statistical basis from which to start would be helpful.

Caroline Flint: The short answer is that I understand that they are cases that go before the court as breaches.

Mr. Grieve: So when my constituents in Burnham in Beaconsfield report that someone subject to an ASBO is running wild in the streets but that no steps are taken by the police for a considerable time to bring them before the court, no breach would be recorded during that time.

Caroline Flint: As far as I am aware that is not the case, but if that is happening in the hon. Gentleman's constituency he should raise it with the authorities locally. [Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman would listen to my answer, that would be polite. If someone has an ASBO made against them, of course we want to make sure that it is enforced.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the figure of one third of ASBOs being breached; obviously, we want to improve on that. The fact that two thirds are not breached gives some measure of the success of the scheme.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that we will move on. There are various other questions relating to particular aspects of ASBOs.

Cost

2. Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): What estimate the Government have made of the average cost of antisocial behaviour orders. [193543]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I know that costs have come down. In 2002, the Home Office published a review of antisocial behaviour orders—the Campbell review—which quoted a cost of £4,800 for an ASBO. However, that figure was based on a very small sample of orders in the early period of their introduction and was skewed by one abnormally complicated and unrepresentative application. Applications usually cost much less than that, and the costs decrease with experience of using the orders. New research is due to be published later this autumn, which will show in detail how costs have significantly reduced since the Campbell review.

Dr. Cable: Can the Minister reconcile his answer that the costs are low with the information that he has just given that a third of people subject to ASBOs are currently in breach and with the fact that the Metropolitan police estimate that the cost of pursuing a breach through the courts can rise to £100,000? In view of the potentially very large costs, what independent work has the Home Office done on the cost-effectiveness of ASBOs relative to other forms of intervention?

Alun Michael: We know that the Liberal Democrats do not support the use of ASBOs, and I presume that the hon. Gentleman seeks to complicate what is a very simple matter. Breaches of ASBOs have resulted in custody for about 43 per cent. of the young people and 58 per cent. of the adults. The message that should go out is that the Government, the police and the local authorities are serious about enforcing ASBOs.

The hon. Gentleman has a responsibility to his constituents to reinforce that message and to say that notice should be taken when an ASBO is issued. In communities in which that message is being given out, the costs are coming down because the authorities are getting used to the application of ASBOs. I have seen that in my constituency and I have heard it from authorities in my constituency. That is what works.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): I have a particular problem with antisocial behaviour and low-level crime in my local shopping centre. The safer neighbourhoods programme was introduced partly as a result of that crime, following a very successful pilot that was carried out in another part of my constituency that saw a reduction of 25 to 30 per cent. of low-level crime in the area. The Metropolitan police press release says that the programme will tackle:

"quality-of-life crimes and issues that affect the day-to-day lives of the public" in each area. Does the Minister believe that the programme will address antisocial behaviour issues in a community, and does she see it as a perfect way of reducing antisocial behaviour in our communities?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): I agree with my hon. Friend. This is about safer communities and safer neighbourhoods, and about all those who have a role to play, including the police, the local authorities, people who work with young people and adults, and, importantly, those with businesses in those communities. We can design out crime and work together. The work that has been done by the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers and others has been fantastic in focusing people's attention on the problems faced by shop workers and on how they can play a constructive role in a partnership.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): I want to put on the record that the Conservative party did not oppose much of the antisocial behaviour legislation, and there have been certain successes. There is no doubt that working with the Home Office, the Metropolitan police and the local authority has produced some innovative antisocial behaviour orders in the City of Westminster in my constituency, particularly in hotspots where there has been a problem with, for example, prostitution.

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) got it absolutely right: ASBOs are very costly. As we all know, the Metropolitan police are under enormous cost constraints. Will the Minister say whether there is serious debate in the Home Office about what other options might be used? I accept that there is a dispute about the figures, but even given the relative success rate of ASBOs to which my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) referred, surely other options might be a more profitable way of ensuring that the lives of all our constituents are improved.

Caroline Flint: A number of other options could be used. We do not advise ASBOs to be used a tool of last resort: they are only one tool. The hon. Gentleman has tabled a question about acceptable behaviour contracts, which are simply another example of voluntary contracts that can be drawn up between, say, the police, social services, even a school and an individual in a way that will address the behaviour that is causing problems in a community. Many such contracts have been successfully applied. They are a voluntary measure, and we are considering all sorts of different ways in which we can tackle offending behaviour. Different costs are obviously associated with them.

There are also cost implications for breaches and appeals—an issue to which the hon. Member for Twickenham alluded. Overall, however, costs have gone down where there is good practice. Importantly, criminal justice practitioners, local authorities and others across the piece tell us that the costs will be far greater in the long term if we do not address offending behaviour among the young. Such behaviour can lead to young people being regulars in the criminal justice system throughout their lives.

Exclusion Orders

3. Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): What plans the Government have to increase the use of exclusion orders from licensed premises. [193544]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): This April, the Home Office published "Violent Crime—Tackling Violent Crime in the Night-Time Economy—Guidelines and Tactical Options for Police" and information on crime and disorder reduction partnerships.

The guide includes details of how a court can make an order prohibiting a person from entering specified licensed premises. It also highlights how antisocial behaviour orders can be used to prohibit certain people from entering specific areas or premises. Those and other powers will continue to be promoted to tackle alcohol-related crime and disorder, as we take forward the recommendations in our alcohol harm reduction strategy for England.

Mr. Grogan: Given that exclusion orders are a cheap and effective way of dealing with alcohol-related crime, and that they are supported by pub companies and the trade unions that represent bar staff, are the Government considering revisiting the proposals in the original licensing White Paper, which would put the courts under a new duty at least to consider making exclusion orders in cases involving violence or disorder in pubs? That could increase the take-up of those very effective orders.

Phil Hope: It is important that we use all available powers, of which exclusion orders—in the 1980 Act—are one. They have enabled individuals who have committed a crime on licensed premises—a pub—to be dealt with. The new ASBOs can be applied more widely, such as when there is antisocial behaviour on licensed premises, for example. The combination of exclusion orders and ASBOs applying to individuals on particular licensed premises or in whole areas such as town centres, if an individual is moving from one place to another and causing antisocial behaviour, gives the authorities the powers that they need to take the action that my hon. Friend requires, which is to see people dealt with most effectively. We would like greater take-up of exclusion orders by landlords of licensed premises and others to ensure that we tackle the problem of one or two people behaving badly late at night, which causes such misery for many.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): Given the problems in central London and areas with many nightclubs, such as Havering, Romford, Ealing and Croydon, what discussions is the Minister having with the Chancellor of the Exchequer to ensure that when the Licensing Act 2003 comes into force we will be able to ensure not only that exclusion orders come into play, but that all other costings will be reimbursed to local authorities, so that life is not made a misery for so many people who live in those residential areas?

Phil Hope: It is important that we get the fees regime correct. I am pleased to say that we are making good progress on agreeing with the Local Government Association on an appropriate system for licensing the fees regime to ensure that costs are recovered and there is no extra burden on local government, while ensuring that it has the wherewithal to deliver the new licensing regime.

Another important new initiative is that of business improvement districts, of which 21 are being piloted under regulations that were passed in the House a few weeks ago. Votes are going on in some of those areas among local businesses at the moment. Many BIDs are focused on the night-time economy and provide an opportunity for new resources and new ways of dealing with difficulties in areas such as those that the hon. Gentleman described, in order to create a thriving, vibrant night-time economy that benefits local communities and brings our town centres back to life.

Tenant Behaviour

4. Jon Trickett (Hemsworth) (Lab): What take-up there has been by local authorities of the voluntary accreditation scheme for landlords as a means of encouraging the proper monitoring of tenant behaviour. [193545]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): The Government do not hold official statistics on the number of accreditation schemes operating, but a directory of scheme codes is available on the Accreditation Network UK website, which holds details of about 70 schemes that are operating across the country. I emphasise that good landlords have nothing to fear from those schemes. The network has produced a model accreditation scheme, which draws together best practice from various schemes around the country. In order to foster consistency, the Government recommend that all local authorities base their schemes on that model.

Jon Trickett: I thank my hon. Friend for his response. I remind the Chamber that following the Conservatives' privatisation of estates in mining villages that were previously owned by the National Coal Board, a minority of irresponsible landlords failed to monitor tenants' behaviour, which led to flight from those communities and the gradual collapse of whole villages, certainly in my constituency. Is it not right that the Government pursue with vigour the proposal to build a partnership between local authorities, communities, responsible landlords and the criminal justice system to stamp out that behaviour, preventing the further destruction of communities by a minority of irresponsible tenants?

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Such local partnership achieves the results that he wants. The legacy that we inherited in 1997 was not only what he describes. Many estates and communities were rundown because of lack of investment in housing stock, and combined with the high unemployment that we inherited, it caused huge difficulties. I am pleased that in many areas the combination of investment in capital stock, the decent homes programme and the return to much higher employment, has changed the nature of many neighbourhoods dramatically.

We must bring together the existing powers in those areas where there are still problems. They include a good accreditation scheme, where local authorities and landlords are working together; the use of antisocial behaviour orders and acceptable behaviour contracts, which can also apply to tenants; and the use of the statutory nuisance powers under previous legislation. If all the tools available in a local area are brought together, we can bear down on the problem and regenerate communities, so that they become cleaner, safer and greener.

Matthew Green (Ludlow) (LD): Does the Minister agree that it is not just the monitoring of tenant behaviour, but the promotion of good standards of housing, that will lead to a reduction in antisocial behaviour? Does he accept that the private sector can be part of the solution rather than just a problem, especially by encouraging private sector landlords to belong to trade organisations such as the National Landlords Association, through which it is easier to promote good practice?

Phil Hope: The hon. Gentleman is right. His point is that if we can promote and invest in good landlords, the unscrupulous landlords who do not play their part in the community will be seen for what they are. The Housing Bill includes the selective licensing of privately rented properties, and takes new powers to target those areas where the problems are the most acute, including the licensing of houses in multiple occupation and interim management orders.

We need to work with the good landlords, with the local authorities and with tenants to build a culture of responsible tenancy: responsible tenants and responsible owners. We also need to use the powers being introduced to bear down on the few landlords and tenants who make life such a misery for others.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Three of the country's leading universities are in Leicestershire. As a resident of the county, I have found it disappointing in recent years to observe the decline in town-gown relationships because of the antisocial behaviour of a small minority of students. However, that is sometimes initiated and aggravated by inattention and lack of the observance of reasonable standards by private landlords who own such properties. Would not there be merit in examining the experience of some university towns and their accreditation schemes, integrating them with local authorities?

Phil Hope: That is a very helpful suggestion. Some universities—I think Birmingham is at the forefront—have been considering the impact of students being given accommodation in one part of town, which creates difficulties because of its effect on the local economy when the students leave in the summer. Other universities—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): Leeds university.

Phil Hope: I am prompted by my hon. Friend that Leeds is one of the universities that is considering ways and means of dealing with the issue and investigating how landlords and local authorities can work together to manage that problem. The result has been lessons that apply not just in other university towns but, as my hon. Friend suggested, to tenants generally.

Local authorities now have an important strategic role considering all the needs of homelessness and housing in their areas, and not just from the landlord's point of view. That strategic role puts the local authority in a prime position to draw on best practice, bringing together the partners to solve the problems.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Replies are getting a little long.

School Exclusions

5. Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills, if he will make a statement on links between school exclusions and antisocial behaviour. [193546]

The Minister for Children, Young People and Families (Margaret Hodge): Excluded pupils are more likely to engage in antisocial behaviour and become involved in crime. Many will be offending prior to the exclusion, others will take up offending afterwards, and there is no clear understanding of the direction of causality. We are investing in early intervention to tackle the behaviour that leads to exclusion through a range of measures: for example, learning support units and learning mentors. Also, we have extended the scope of parenting orders and contracts to cover cases of exclusion following serious misbehaviour.

Mr. Randall: I thank the Minister for that reply. It is probably self-apparent that once those who are causing problems in schools are excluded they are very likely to cause the same sort of problems outside the school gates. It is obviously a problem. What discussions has the Minister had with other Departments on the matter? Presumably, once students are excluded they are not receiving a full-time education and are out in the community. What discussions have been had with the Home Office to try to get a grip on the problem?

Margaret Hodge: Every child of statutory school age will be receiving education, whether in school, in a pupil referral unit or by some other means at home. One of the issues that we have been pursuing with local education authorities is ensuring that they give every pupil, excluded or not, an education, as is their entitlement. However, it is a difficult issue, because having disruptive pupils in the classroom is of no benefit to the other children who are there to learn. We have to balance the interests of the rest of the cohort in the classroom with those of the individual child.

The "Every Child Matters" agenda and the reforms that we are trying to instil in children's services are about bringing together all the agencies that work with troubled and troublesome youngsters to try to ensure that we prevent them from getting to the point of exclusion or, if we do exclude them, that they get the proper co-ordinated support from all services, so that we minimise the risk and harm that they could cause and maximise their potential and the contribution that they could make to the community.

Mr. Randall: Has any research been carried out into whether those who have been excluded try to influence people still in school to get them involved in trouble?

Margaret Hodge: I do not have any research to hand, but I share the hon. Gentleman's view that troublesome teenagers probably influence their peer group, whether they are in school, on the council estates or in their communities. Wherever they are located, peer groups have a strong influence. How do we tackle that, particularly with teenagers? In working towards the youth Green Paper, which we hope to publish in the not too distant future, we are trying to find positive activities in which to engage young people. It is important to give them something to do and somewhere to go.

Trying to spot the difficulties early so that intervention can be made early is also important, as is getting the agencies to work together and with the families to ensure that early intervention. The work that we are doing to support parents, as well as promoting the interests of children and young people, should go some way to lessening the problem.

Matthew Green (Ludlow) (LD): I am sure that the Minister will be aware that one of the best ways of reducing exclusion is reducing levels of unacceptable behaviour in classrooms. One of the most successful ways that that has happened in recent years has been through the building of a school designed by Sir Norman Foster. As I understand it, that school has seen a dramatic reduction in the number of pupils playing truant and in the bad behaviour of those in school. To what extent is the DFES investigating how good design of schools can play a part in reducing unacceptable behaviour levels?

Margaret Hodge: Design is a factor, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman supports the enormous capital investment that we have embarked on, particularly for secondary schools. We have said that within 10 years every secondary school will either be renewed or rebuilt so that it is fit for purpose in the new century. I also hope that he supports the investment that we are making directly in behaviour and attendance. We are spending nearly £500 million in the 2003 to 2006 spending review period on promoting good behaviour in the classroom and dealing with both authorised and non-authorised non-attendance, which is another factor that can cause problems in the community such as antisocial behaviour.

I would also point out to the hon. Gentleman that as well as buildings we must consider the quality of the staff and the support given to children and young people from teachers and other school support staff. Our massive investment in recruiting and keeping teachers, and offering them appropriate professional development, is important.

Police Community Support Officers

6. Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): What measures are being introduced to extend the powers of PCSOs. [193547]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): In the consultation paper "Policing: Modernising Police Powers to Meet Community Needs" which was published in August, the Government proposed adding to the powers of PCSOs. I congratulate my hon. Friend on his ten-minute Bill, which raised the issue in the House. As is so often the case, the development of Government policy on antisocial behaviour has been greatly helped by the attention brought to it by Members such as him.

The new powers proposed for PCSOs in the paper are those to direct traffic, to deter begging, to enforce byelaws and to search a detained person who may present a danger to himself or others—that particular power has been piloted in my hon. Friend's area. In the consultation paper, we also proposed extending the powers of PCSOs to deal with the night-time economy and alcohol-related antisocial behaviour. The consultation period has now closed, and we are considering all the replies and hope to respond in the not too distant future.

Mr. David: I thank the Minister for her positive reply. The introduction of PCSOs has been an undoubted success, and the fact that communities have responded so positively shows that the Government are moving in the right direction. However, there is a need to strengthen the powers of the PCSOs, as the Minister suggested. I recognise that this is a contentious area, but there is an argument that, in certain specified, limited circumstances, PCSOs should have a power of arrest. I hope that at some time in the not too distant future, the Government will find time to consider that possibility.

Caroline Flint: On the whole area of antisocial behaviour, the Government have been very much in listening mode, taking account of people's direct experiences. However, it is important that we walk before we run. We must recognise that we should deal with the power of arrest carefully and constructively, and we must be clear that there are different roles for police officers and community support officers. We want to ensure that the powers that we grant will be used—that is important—and that there is adequate support for PCSOs. We also want to ensure that the scheme is developed in line with the law enforcement family, in which people work together. I have listened to my hon. Friend, but we must first ensure that we get right the present powers and those that might be on board in the not too distant future.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): The divisional commander in Havering has been pleased to have PCSOs as an additional aid to policing, but he shares my concern that, having heard the Home Secretary express his intention of increasing significantly the number of PCSOs and the possibility of increasing their duties, they will be used instead of, and not as well as, police constables. We want to ensure that if the cost is coming out of the global budget of, in our case, the Metropolitan police, the PCSOs will be additional rather than taken from the budget for police constables.

Caroline Flint: There is no intention to take money from the budget for police constables. We have the highest recorded number of police officers ever—

Angela Watkinson: Not in Havering.

Caroline Flint: Well, the number of police officers in England and Wales is the highest ever, and that is welcome. However, it is a question not only of police numbers but of ensuring that fully trained police officers can carry out the duties for which they have been given powers. It is a question of intelligence-led policing and of ensuring that civilians can do some of the bureaucratic work because, important though it is, we do not want police officers spending their time behind desks. In that respect, community support officers are about added value—they add value to the family of law enforcement.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Over the past few months, I have had extensive contact with parish councils and police officers in North-West Leicestershire, and if my experiences are typical, there is no doubt that communities are strongly warming to CSOs and that police officers are working effectively with them. However, in echoing the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David), I put it to the Minister that CSOs would be more effective if they were more certain of their future. Many of the funding schemes are very short term. Can the Minister give us some assurance that, at least in the medium term, CSOs can be certain of the jobs that they hold for longer periods? Periods of two years or less are no spur towards effectiveness and do not boost morale.

Caroline Flint: I take on board my hon. Friend's point, but the announcement just a short time ago of our ambition to raise the number of CSOs to 25,000 gives some indication of how important we think they are. The certainty that we can provide through funding is important, but we must also consider what is provided in local communities. CSOs have a right and proper place in tackling concerns in our communities, and particularly antisocial behaviour. It is a matter of changing how we deal with such issues and then of chief constables and others, including local authority colleagues who are involved with neighbourhood wardens, doing things differently. We acknowledge that that will require additional funding in some areas and we have put record amounts into provision. However, in some ways, it is also question of saying, "If it works, it's worth funding. If it doesn't work, stop funding it." Those choices have to be made at national and local level. However, I hear my hon. Friend's point.

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): Has the Minister considered the role that community support officers could play in serving graffiti removal notices on businesses such as the Post Office, Telewest and Network Rail, which, certainly in my constituency, are often the least effective at removing graffiti?

Caroline Flint: The hon. Gentleman has tabled a question on graffiti, and we take the issue very seriously. Graffiti removal has primarily involved local authorities. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have consulted widely on how we can improve the way in which we deal with those responsible for graffiti, including tagging, as well as with graffiti on amenities. Local authorities are being given powers so that they can make organisations remove graffiti within 28 days. In my community in Doncaster, community support officers employed by the local authority are often involved in addressing graffiti issues.

I hear what the hon. Gentleman says, and we are constantly discussing the different roles that individuals such as community officers, neighbourhood wardens or others can play in dealing with such problems in our communities.

Drugs

7. Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what steps the Government have taken to assess the effect of the availability of illegal drugs in schools on antisocial behaviour. [193548]

The Minister for Children, Young People and Families (Margaret Hodge): Evidence from the Department of Health's survey "Smoking, drinking and drug use among young people" indicates that there is a strong link between truancy and exclusion from school and drug taking. We have made it clear that illegal drugs have no place in schools. We are supporting head teachers and governing bodies, together with local partners, including the police, in their efforts to tackle illegal drugs in schools.

Mr. Atkinson: I thank the Minister for her reply. I apologise for not being here at the start of the sitting and for having to leave quite soon to take part in the debate on the Floor of the House. However, it is difficult to be in two places at once.

There is anecdotal evidence that recreational drugs in particular—ecstasy being one such drug—are freely traded in some schools. School heads and staff are reluctant to involve the police in stopping and searching pupils in the school grounds, because it would give the school such a bad reputation. What advice does the Minister have for head teachers and staff who realise that some of their pupils may be taking drugs or, more seriously, trading them?

Margaret Hodge: I am quite surprised by the experience in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, because we are encouraging more and more schools to have a police presence on the premises. Indeed, a new school is being built in my constituency that will have a mini police station or a place for a police surgery within the grounds.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): What? God almighty.

Margaret Hodge: The hon. Gentleman expresses surprise, but I think that it is important to have all those services that support children and families located around the area where they feel safe. Whether it is the police, health and youth services or other services, having them located together is a positive move to encourage positive behaviour, rather than always coming in when things have gone wrong and having to implement measures such as antisocial behaviour or parenting orders.

I am surprised by the comments of the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson). Perhaps he will write to me about the schools where he has had such experience. We are encouraging heads to work much more closely with schools. We are providing a lot of education about drugs and we are training teachers to provide better education to prevent children moving into the drug culture.

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): I am slightly horrified by the Minister's last reply. What a state we have got into. I wanted to ask her about cannabis use in the school playground. There is growing evidence of a reaction that can cause mental health difficulty leading to antisocial behaviour among a significant minority of young people who take cannabis. Will the Government look again at the decision that they made some months ago to reclassify cannabis as a class C drug? Was that not with hindsight a rather absurd decision?

Margaret Hodge: The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), who is the great expert on drugs in the Home Office, will deal with that. I want to come back on the issue of whether it is horrifying to have a police presence within a school. [HON. MEMBERS: "A police station."] There will be some police officers based in the school.

Matthew Green (Ludlow) (LD): Armed guards?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Margaret Hodge: There is a mistaken view being expressed in that horror that the police are not there to prevent crimes but simply to detect them. If we want to build confidence among young people in the police service and if we want to move from always intervening only when things have gone wrong, we cannot keep the police as a separate arm. If we want to build that stronger preventive infrastructure and to prevent children and young people from falling through the net, it is important to have the police service and the whole of the criminal justice system engaged in the support services that we provide for children and young people, whether that is through health services, social care, or education.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): I do not agree with the hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) that it was a mistake to reclassify cannabis. We have classifications to demonstrate the different harms of drugs. It is important that we do that in a credible way. Our polling has shown that the work we did during the reclassification process was successful, because the vast majority of young people continue to believe that it is an illegal drug. Having said that, the whole point of the work that we do for young people on substance misuse is geared to deal with all sorts of drugs—both illegal and legal—that young children can get into a pattern of misusing. We have pooled the young people's treatment budget from a number of different organisations so there is one pot locally. Local people and agencies can decide how best to use that money.

Young people from 10 places are currently involved in drug-testing pilot schemes; even if a person does not test for a class A drug, evidence of other substance misuse will be attended to. This is about the relative harms of different drugs and having credible information with which to engage young people, but making sure that they recognise that all drugs in all classifications do harm. However, that harm is relative.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): That we should have mini-police stations at schools is symptomatic of the dreadful state to which our once great nation has sunk.

On a wider subject and leaving drug abuse to one side, is the Minister not concerned about solvent abuse, which has resulted in more deaths among teenagers than drug abuse in recent years? Is she not concerned that the main thrust of the education programme of the Department for Education and Skills on that front is to do with the drugs themselves and has remarkably little to do with solvent abuse? Will she commit the Government to increasing the amount of education on the subject of solvent abuse?

Caroline Flint: The hon. Gentleman makes a point. Many substances, both legal and illegal, cause huge problems if they are misused by anyone—but especially by young people. Last year, I and my colleagues from the Department for Education and Skills and the Department of Health started a project called "Blueprint", which is being carried out in years 7 and 8 at about 25 schools. It has brought together some of the best practices in drug education and prevention among young people from around the world.

I was pleased to visit a school in Lancashire, which is looking at a whole range of habits, from illegal drugs to solvents, cigarettes and alcohol—and also prescribed drugs. Some children have access to prescribed drugs at home, and there have been some terrible accidents as a result of children not realising the seriousness of using drugs straight from the medicine cabinet. It is an important issue, and we are looking across the board for better ways to engage with young people, in order to explain the consequences of taking substances that could have serious effects. Access to solvents is also a problem for young people, and legislation has been enacted to deal with that matter. However, we have to be vigilant about those who might be disruptive by allowing youngsters access to solvents.

Witness safety

8. Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): To ask the Secretary of State what measures the Government will introduce to ensure the safety of witnesses to antisocial behaviour when giving evidence to the police. [193549]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): The Government's national strategy "A New Deal for Victims and Witnesses", of July 2003, acknowledges the need for victims and witnesses of antisocial behaviour to receive the same level of support as victims and witnesses of crime. The national roll-out of the "No Witness, No Justice" project started in April 2004, and we hope that it will improve the experience of all witnesses moving through the criminal justice system, whether in the civil or the criminal courts.

Angela Watkinson: Havering police have just issued their first ASBO. One of the main contributory factors in the delay and the inordinately long time that it has taken to produce the order was the difficulty of persuading witnesses to appear in court.

There is a real fear among those giving evidence, particularly in cases involving "neighbours from hell" in which not only the individual who is going to court but the whole family are engaged in a variety of antisocial behaviour. The real fear of witnesses is that the case will go to court and they will give evidence, but the case will fail. Those who give evidence will then have to return to the situation that caused the problem. Not only the accused but other members of the accused person's family are likely to seek retribution. The protection of witnesses will result in enormous costs, not only in the court itself but in the outcome after having to attend court. Has the Minister given any thought to the funding of that process?

Caroline Flint: I am pleased that the hon. Lady's area has finally applied for its first antisocial behaviour order. However, there may be some problems; I do not think she quite understands that, in applications for ASBOs heard in the civil court, one can use hearsay and professional witnesses. It is different for applications made to the criminal court.

As I said earlier, it would help if Members of Parliament took the opportunity to find out what is best practice elsewhere. As the hon. Lady said, antisocial behaviour is often about people living very close to those who are causing the problem. That is the very reason why hearsay and professional witnesses, such as police officers or housing officers, can be engaged to give evidence in the civil court.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor has indicated that he is keen to look at whether the special measures, such as using video, that are afforded to those in criminal proceedings could be afforded to witnesses in civil proceedings. There are measures in place for cases where someone's next-door neighbour might be the problem. The way to protect people in those circumstances is through hearsay and professional witnesses. However, we are mindful that on occasion individuals may need to come forward, and my right hon. and learned Friend has talked about considering special measures for people in that situation.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend not accept that the message, particularly on the availability of professional witnesses, is not getting across? When some hooligans were destroying a little shopping centre in my constituency, one of my constituents complained to the police, but all they said was, "Well, if you want to do anything about it, you'd better give us a camera with some film in it." So, my constituent got his camera and poked it out of the window the next time the kids were there, but they then reported him for paedophilia. The accusation was taken up by a separate police officer and went a long way before I intervened personally and stopped the nonsense. There is a long way to go before witnesses are given proper protection.

Caroline Flint: My hon. Friend raises an important point. When young people—or adults, for that matter—cause trouble in an area, the section 30 dispersal powers are available as well. Indeed, I know that he has had success in his area in that regard. We are trying to raise the benchmark on how all the measures to deal with antisocial behaviour are applied in England and Wales. In some areas, there has been astounding success, which has been achieved through effective partnership between a number of different agencies, engaging with and listening to the local community and also gaining people's trust, so that when they report incidents there is a method to collect that information so that it can be used in the courts.

A lot more has to be done, however. There is no doubt that those in management and supervisory positions, whether in the police service or local authorities, have to ensure that their front-line staff are aware of the powers that are in place, because it is important that people understand that the powers are there to be used. There is can-do attitude, which is demonstrated by the number of places where people are doing just that—getting on with the job and dealing with the problem. In doing so, they increase the confidence of the local community, not only in policing, but in all the other services with a role to play.

Breaches of orders

9. Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): How many antisocial behaviour orders have been breached in each year since 1999, and how many of those were punished with fines and how many with prison sentences? [193730]

The Minister for Children, Young People and Families (Margaret Hodge): Breach data are available from June 2000 to December 2002. During that period, 372 breaches of ASBOs were recorded: 14 in 2000, 120 in 2001 and 238 in 2002. On punishment, in 2000, five received a fine, and five received a prison sentence. In 2001, 15 received a fine and 62 received a prison sentence and in 2002, 20 received a fine and 112 a prison sentence.

Andrew Selous: I am grateful to the Minister, but what advice would she give to my constituents who have suffered horrendous antisocial behaviour for the last couple of years and to the officers of the central division of Bedfordshire police who have wanted to impose ASBOs but, in collecting evidence, have sometimes found witnesses to be far too scared? That relates to the question of evidence, which we have dealt with. The Under-Secretary for the Home Department mentioned professional witnesses, so could the Minister say a bit more about that? From which agency of government or local authority department are professional witnesses supposed to spring?

Margaret Hodge: I would have hoped that the previous answer from my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary could have given comfort to the hon. Gentleman. Professional witnesses could be local authority officers, members of the police service or any of the professionals who are party to a case or have relevant evidence. Professional witnesses do not have to be the individuals who have experienced the antisocial behaviour, but professionals acting on behalf of those individuals. We have also talked about the steps that the Lord Chancellor hopes to take to enable people to give evidence in a more anonymous environment.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): May I ask the Minister to return to the question that I asked the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department? I listened carefully to the answer that I received.

My question concerned the relationship between the number of ASBO breaches and the number of reported breaches. It is not a trick question, but it is important to try to assess what is going on. I have received anecdotal information that when an ASBO is breached, it may be a considerable time before anything is done about it. Meanwhile, one gets complaints from members of the local community. It may also be the case that sometimes no action is taken on reported breaches of ASBOs. Is the Home Office collating statistical material on that matter and, if so, would it be possible to make that available to hon. Members so that we can make an assessment?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): As far as I am aware, information is not being collected centrally on anecdotal evidence about situations in which a police officer sees that an ASBO has been breached and does not report it, so that the breach does not go back to court. That is a rather convoluted situation. If the hon. Gentleman has evidence that ASBOs are being breached and action is not being taken, we would be open to receiving that evidence and information on where those cases are occurring. Our view is that if ASBOs are breached, that should be referred to the relevant authorities and the necessary proceedings should be followed.

If there is evidence of such situations occurring, it is important to bring that to the attention of the local senior police officers or others who are charged with the responsibility for that area. However, as I said earlier, one positive thing that we do know is that only about a third of all ASBOs are breached.

I would not want there to be confusion about the figures, because there are issues related to the number of people who have had ASBOs imposed on them, and the number of times that someone might breach an ASBO and be taken to court, resulting in a further action against them. There are the numbers of people and the numbers of breaches, but it is possible that an individual might, on occasion, commit more than one breach, which then would go back into the system and be dealt with again.

I will examine what the hon. Gentleman says in more detail. However, we do not collect data centrally on breaches that are not followed up by police officers on the ground, because that would be hard to do. However I will ask my hon. Friend the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety about that matter and whether she has given it any attention.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): My housing trust has a specialist unit. Is there a case for having specialist units in the police, and special courts to deal with the issue more effectively?

Caroline Flint: What we do have in some areas are special prosecutors. That was a result of recognising that, when the antisocial behaviour legislation was introduced, it was quite difficult to get those on the court side of the process to appreciate and understand what we meant by antisocial behaviour and its impact on local communities. That is one of the reasons why, in some areas, special prosecutors have been involved. It is also one of the reasons why my colleagues in the Department for Constitutional Affairs have been engaged in training with the clerks to the courts and magistrates, so that they understand better what is happening in local communities and how to deal with it.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Just for the record, we did not oppose ASBOs, as the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality said. However, I am sure that that will not make any difference to what he says in future.

There is a real issue about breaches of ASBOs. None of us wants to see such breaches, but one of the things that might increase the number of potential breaches is if ASBOs are overly prescriptive in terms of the prohibitions that are put into them. For example, there was the case of the 13-year-old who was told that he must not say the word "grass" anywhere in England and Wales for six years, or the 21-year-old who was told that he was not to wear any head gear under any circumstances, or the 88-year-old who was forbidden to be sarcastic to his neighbours and has now committed three breaches, which have presumably gone into the records. Is there a case for better guidelines on what should properly be included in ASBOs, so that they are focusing on real antisocial behaviour, rather than on what someone has in mind as a prejudice?

Caroline Flint: This is interesting, because I think that some of the ways in which ASBOs have been applied have been really creative. In some cases, the creative use of ASBOs has had more resonance with the young person as an immediate sanction for their offending behaviour than any bureaucratic blueprint that we could pull together about how they should operate. It is important to allow creativity so that people can get to the heart of the problem.

I have two things to say to the hon. Gentleman. First, an ASBO can be varied. That is important because if—[Interruption.] He says that they should be, and they can be. If, for example, a young person in respect of whom an ASBO has been issued improves their behaviour, there is room to vary the order. One young gentleman was prohibited from going into a certain area. During the period covered by the ASBO, he joined a local football team and a match took place in the area from which he was excluded. Quite rightly, it was asked why that young man, who was then engaged in positive behaviour, should be denied access to that area.

Secondly, as from 1 May this year, individual support orders can also be attached to ASBOs. ASBOs are about what one cannot do. Individual support orders are about trying to challenge behaviour. I do not agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman's point. We are dealing with the issue in a rounded way. We are stopping people doing certain things and challenging behaviour in the short and long term.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think that my expectations as expressed at the beginning of questions have been fulfilled. Hon. Members will draw their conclusions when they read Hansard tomorrow. There is obvious tension between providing opportunities for supplementary questions and more than one ministerial answer, and making progress down the Order Paper. However, brevity should still be our watchword if we are to make a success of such sessions in future.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will know that Mr. Speaker deprecates the practice of Ministers making announcements outside the House of Commons when they should properly be making them here. We are having this sitting on antisocial behaviour orders this afternoon. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) made a very important point at the outset, which was that the Prime Minister is about to make a statement on that issue. It is stated in The Guardian no less—so some will believe that it must be true:

> "Blair announces huge leap in Asbo programme".

We do not know whether what Ministers have told us today constitutes the full exposure of the announcement being made by the Prime Minister. Should the Prime Minister—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that what Ministers say, and what any hon. Member says, cannot be controlled by the Chair. If he wishes to pursue the matter, that is probably better done by a point of order on the Floor of the House. All I can do is take the Chair at a sitting that has been arranged. Everything that has been said by every hon. Member and every Minister is on the record to be judged and perhaps, at a later time, questioned.

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I just point out that the level of ASBOs, which may well be referred to elsewhere, was given in my reply earlier?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: One must not, on a point of order, seek to pursue the argument:

United Nations

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Heppell.]

3.34 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): I am pleased to have the opportunity, for the second year in a row, to open a debate on Britain's position within the UN. The debate will demonstrate, in particular, our commitment to engaging far more on critical issues. When we undertook the debate last year, we were at a critical juncture. The UN had been divided over military action in Iraq. It had endured the worst ever attack on a UN operation, with the murder in Iraq of 22 UN personnel, including, tragically, Sergio Vieira de Mello, one of the world's greatest ambassadors for peace. A heated debate continued over how the UN should respond to international crises, whether those were terrorist attacks, humanitarian disasters or environmental devastation. There has been a further escalation in terrorist activity—not just the carnage of suicide bombings in the middle east but the despicable kidnap and murder of innocent civilians in Iraq and the frankly sickening scenes of children being held hostage and brutally murdered in Beslan. Conflict, poverty and disease are still ravaging parts of Africa.

That is a grim and distressing picture, but I believe that there are signs of hope. I am encouraged by the unity among UN member states in dealing with Afghanistan, Haiti and the Democratic Republic of the Congo and I commend the consensus among UN members on action to fight terrorism, prevent conflict and cope with natural disasters.

The UN's role in Iraq has also been crucial. Ambassador Brahimi's patient, and determined negotiations with Iraq's political and religious groups were, I believe, instrumental in forming a political authority and paving the way for the UN's role in preparing for elections for a representative and democratic Iraq. The United Nations team, under the secretary-general's special representative Ashraf Qazi, is now working with the Iraqi independent elections commission to prepare for elections in January.

Returning to Iraq has been an immensely difficult decision for the UN, and in the face of last year's attack the security of UN personnel has been of paramount importance. We and the United States are working closely with the UN to ensure that it gets the security that it needs. I applaud its courage and pay tribute to UN staff and military and civilian personnel from the 30 nations in the multinational force, and to those working for non-governmental organisations, voluntary bodies and businesses, in difficult and dangerous circumstances, to help the people of Iraq.

As we move closer to the January elections the terrorists and insurgents are stepping up their attacks in an attempt to derail the political process. We must do all that we can to stick to the agreed political timetable, in which the elections are vital for a stable and united democracy to take root in Iraq. As the Foreign Secretary has repeatedly said, we need security for elections and elections for security. We are working closely with the Iraqi interim Government, the elections commission, the Iraqi security forces and the UN to ensure that adequate security arrangements are in place for the election period.

The UN has worked tirelessly with the African Union and the European Union to bring about an end to the fighting in the Darfur region and to provide humanitarian assistance to thousands of displaced people. Recent Security Council resolutions have, I believe, sent a clear message to the Sudanese Government and the rebel groups that they must do more to protect the people of Darfur.

The UN has significantly increased its work in the Democratic Republic of the Congo to help disarm, demobilise and rehabilitate Congolese combatants. UN experts are now monitoring the arms embargo, which is a vital process in preventing further fighting. In Haiti at the beginning of the year the UN responded rapidly to the breakdown of law and order by deploying, first, a multinational interim force and, then, a longer stabilisation mission to help maintain security and find solutions to the issues that had caused violence.

Today there are more than 53,000 peacekeepers working in 16 UN missions around the world. Yet we all recognise—the UN, individual member states and humanitarian agencies—that we are not doing enough soon enough to prevent conflict from erupting, to build peace, to reconstruct broken nations and, in short, to break the cycle of violence, whether that is caused by age-old political or religious strife, a collapse in law and order, poverty, hunger or disease.

Every conflict, wherever it is, has ramifications for the international community. Extremists are using regional conflicts to spread terror across the globe. International security is at stake, so we have to stop the terrorists. That means stopping the flow of weapons and ensuring that weapons of mass destruction never fall into their hands. It also means, critically, tackling the causes—political, economic and social. That is a huge challenge, which only a massive international effort can meet.

As my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary said earlier in the year:

> "Global security is our collective responsibility, and we must all engage in this debate."

That is why I believe that the high-level panel, established by the Secretary General, which will report in December, marks a significant step in the way in which the UN approaches today's threats to international peace and security.

I am optimistic that the panel's report will provide ideas for effective collective action in response to those international threats, and give renewed impetus to debates on United Nations reform.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Will the Under-Secretary explain why his paper, Cm 6325, does not once mention the oil-for-food programme and the United Nations' role in it? Will the hon. Gentleman comment on the fact that Kofi Annan still refuses to make public the findings of the oil-for-food report? Is not that a disgrace? Should not the public be able to see that information? Would it not help to restore faith in the work of the United Nations?

Mr. Rammell: The oil-for-food programme inquiry, with which we are co-operating, has come up with serious criticisms that it is the responsibility of nation states, through their legal systems, to pursue. The processes are under way and that is the important and correct manner in which to deal with the issues.

We have proposed several ideas on the issues being discussed by the panel, details of which can be found in the annexe to the command paper, to which the hon. Gentleman referred. We look forward to an early discussion of the report's recommendations with the United Nations and with other member states.

I said earlier that we need to be more proactive in preventing conflict from erupting in the first place—

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way. I welcome the second annual report on the United Nations, which was a great initiative by the Government. I refer to the annexe and the reform of the United Nations. People say that if we did not have a United Nations we would need to invent it, but everyone recognises that perhaps it does not work as well as it could, therefore there is need for reform, and I am pleased about the Government's proposals in that respect. Can my hon. Friend reassure us that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, on behalf of the Government, is making every effort to ensure some form of consensus, so that Kofi Annan can put a set of proposals for radical reform to the UN in the near future?

Mr. Rammell: The need for consensus, and not consensus of the lowest common denominator, is a key factor that is driving our work at present. We also need to establish the means to take that consensus forward and get agreement.

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): I do not want the Minister popping up and down in his present condition. He mentioned the important high level panel report, which we look forward to receiving. I believe that it is reporting in December. We are disappointed that the debate on the United Nations has been moved from the Chamber to Westminster Hall. Can the hon. Gentleman assure us that after the report is available there will be a debate in the Chamber to discuss the important measures that will no doubt be put before us and to build a consensus from Westminster?

Mr. Rammell: The hon. Gentleman knows that decisions on where debates take place are beyond the respective Front Benches. Nevertheless, his argument is compelling, given the seriousness of the issues, and I hope that if time is available we can discuss them on the Floor of the House.

I said earlier that we needed to be more proactive in preventing conflict from erupting in the first place, which means identifying and analysing specific threats at an early stage. It also means agreeing collectively what is the appropriate course of action. In doing so, we need to mobilise all the resources of the United Nations from the earliest stages of a potential crisis. That requires strong leadership from the United Nations, the political will of its members to sustain UN action over the long term, and UN institutions that are focused on priority action.

The United Nations needs to develop non-military tools for engagement and intervention, including reintroducing the rule of law, support for policing and, where necessary, emergency civilian administration. Where non-military action is insufficient to avert conflict or a humanitarian crisis, the UN needs to agree when military action might be needed. I have often spoken of the urgent need to address the issue; we simply cannot let another Rwanda or Kosovo happen. Three years ago the UK proposed a set of guidelines on intervention for consideration by the Security Council, and now is the time to move the debate forward.

We must also ensure that the UN's counter-terrorism and counter-proliferation mechanisms are sufficiently robust and have the resources to carry through the vital monitoring and support work that they began this year. One of the greatest threats to human security is, the estimated 600 million small arms and light weapons in global circulation. Those weapons kill more than 300,000 people a year, many of whom are innocent civilians. The Foreign Secretary rightly made an important announcement recently that the UK would start work soon with international partners on an international arms trade treaty. That is a positive step forward. Taking arms out of circulation would make it easier to combat terrorism and crime and to secure long-term peace and development in areas of conflict.

The UN's peacekeeping efforts, which are universally admired, need to be strengthened to provide more recovery and reconstruction support, thus enabling states to get back on their feet and sustain the peace. Closer co-operation with regional organisations and more effective co-ordination between UN agencies would help make the best use of resources and avoid duplication of peace-building programmes.

Much of the UN's expertise lies in the remarkable work that its agencies have performed for decades in alleviating poverty and supporting the most vulnerable people in the poorest parts of the world. For that to have a lasting effect, the international community must redouble its efforts and increase the resources that it puts into poverty reduction. Reducing poverty and inequality will go a long way to preventing and resolving conflict.

The UK has taken the lead by proposing a new international financing facility, which would and could bring forward aid flows, allowing them to be increased to $50 billion a year in the short term. The UK is already rightly a major contributor to the UN system, in both our engagement and our financial support. UK contributions to the UN in 2003 were more than £623 million, and we are the fourth largest contributor to the UN peacekeeping budget after the United States, Japan and Germany. We supply more troops to UN operations than any other permanent member of the Security Council. That is a record of which all Members can be rightly proud.

We will also use our strong position in the UN to press forward with the reform programme set out by the Secretary-General, so that the UN is structured and resourced to meet the challenges that lie ahead. At the General Assembly last month, the Secretary-General spoke powerfully about extending the rule of law throughout the world as the only way to guarantee freedom for all. I have just returned from New York, where as president of the Security Council I chaired the debate on building justice and strengthening the rule of law. We will continue to support the UN's efforts to put the rule of law firmly at the centre of post-conflict reconstruction.

We will use our presidency of the European Union and our chairmanship of G8 in 2005 to make further progress on a free and fair international trading system, on tackling poverty and disease in Africa and on slowing environmental damage from climate change. We have nevertheless much work to do, but I believe that when we meet again for this debate in a year's time, the UN will have reviewed progress on meeting the important millennium development goals. Only by reaching those goals can we hope to achieve sustainable security and, from there, stability and prosperity for all mankind. As the Secretary-General said at the General Assembly in New York, let us not be found wanting.

We are at an historically important juncture: there is a future that can secure and protect our world, and the United Nations, and the efforts of all the nation states that make up the UN, has to be at the heart of that.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Perhaps the most important issue in protecting our world is nuclear non-proliferation. The command paper to which I have already referred includes warm words about preventing the spread of nuclear technology, but there is a real problem with Iran's verification of its return to the International Atomic Energy Agency. I understand from today's press that talks are continuing on the issue. Will the Minister comment on what the British Government are doing? It seems to me that until we can get a compliant Iran, it will be very difficult to achieve a stable situation in Iraq.

Mr. Rammell: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that, with France and Germany, we have been at the forefront of efforts to take a constructive stance on Iran and address the concerns that exist about its nuclear capability. We have consistently said that Iran needs to go the whole distance in addressing the international community's concerns, particularly ending any fuel cycle activities and demonstrating that it has done so. That is the challenge for Iran between now and the IAEA board meeting, which I believe takes place towards the end of November. At that stage, we will have to judge whether Iran has made that commitment and reassured the international community. If not, we will have to seek reference to the Security Council.

This is an extremely important debate and I look forward to hearing the contributions from other hon. Members.

3.50 pm

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): It is a pleasure to take part in this important debate. I must put on record our slight disappointment that it has been curtailed to two hours and is taking place in Westminster Hall but, none the less, we welcome it. We certainly welcome the Command Paper that the Government have produced. It is very useful indeed and, in terms of the reform of the United Nations, which I will deal with in a moment, we agree with the broad thrust of the Government's suggestions.

We agree that in the 21st century we need a strong United Nations. I sometimes ask myself what the alternative is to a strong international organisation such as the United Nations—I sometimes even find myself asking that about the European Union. We do not always appreciate everything that it says and does, but what is the alternative? We do not want to return to a 19th-century world of nation-state activity, shifting alliances and unilateralism. Nor do we want the Orwellian nightmare of regional power blocs constantly at war with each other. We need a strong United Nations.

The horrors of world war one and world war two demanded a response of world leaders to set up mechanisms to promote global peace and stability. The challenges are different in this globalising and interdependent world, but they also demand a streamlined and effective modern United Nations—new global architecture to fit a modern world. We support the reform process. We want the UN to be the body that is respected by all and that makes and enforces rules by which we can carry out our international business and achieve global stability. There is no plan B; that body must be the United Nations.

The UN must also be a forum for dialogue. As we know, dialogue is crucial to overcoming misunderstandings and hostility. The fault lines in the world used to be between east and west. It is now much more complex than that, but there are still fault lines, so there is a need for forum and dialogue.

Although the Minister gave an upbeat speech today, for understandable reasons, about the performance of the United Nations, I shall be slightly more critical of aspects of its performance over recent years. Many of us were concerned that the conduct of some members of the Security Council over the recent conflict in Iraq has undermined a great deal of its credibility.

With the honourable exception of the intervention in Afghanistan, which came hot on the heels of the 9/11 outrages, and possibly Haiti, which the Minister mentioned, it is possible to argue that over the past 10 or 15 years, the UN has notched up precious few successes. Recent cases include Iraq and Kosovo, where it was unable to agree, Bosnia, where it is rightly claimed that it moved too slowly, Rwanda, where it was looking the wrong way, Israel-Palestine, where it has been powerless to intervene, Zimbabwe, where it seems unable to intervene, and Darfur in Sudan, where its intervention is now welcome but has been far too long in coming. Judging by its performance, the UN's credibility is under threat, which is why the reform process is so important.

I recognise that there has been much positive work and I pay tribute, as the Minister did, to the important work of Lakhdar Brahimi in putting together the Iraqi Interim Government. Most of us were impressed that that was so well done and has stood the test of time over the past few months. I also pay tribute to the work of the International Atomic Energy Agency. We hope that that will have a positive outcome and we support continued intervention in Iran, trying to persuade that country to discontinue its uranium enrichment programme—an absolutely crucial process. The Minister will have our support for taking effective action on that issue.

[Mr. Gary Streeter]

In the debate about reform of the United Nations there is a vital question that I do not believe the Government have asked in their Command Paper: what is the United Nations for? It was put together in a different age and has grown like Topsy ever since. Although the Minister gave us a quick tour d'horizon of what it does, I look at the UN's flow chart—the list of activities, agencies, committees and bodies—and ask myself whether the organisation has lost sight of its core business, which should be peace and security.

I have done quite a lot of international development work in the past few years and I must say that we need to make the point that investment, whether public or private, is very hard to secure where there is conflict, but where there is an absence of conflict, both public and private investment comes pouring in and increases living standards.

The United Nations has a vital role to play in dealing with conflict and in promoting peace and security, yet it is also involved in many other activities. There is the United Nations University, the United Nations Office for Project Services, the United Nations human settlements programme, the UN Institute for Disarmament Research and so on. There are many UN agencies and committees, all of which I am sure are very worthy and doing important work, but as we know from other organisations, we can sometimes get bogged down and distracted if we lose sight of core business.

I am sorry that the Government's Command Paper did not ask what the core business of the UN is and how it can better focus on it: indeed, how it can do less better. None the less, we look forward to the high level panel report, which will be produced in December. We have great respect for Lord Hannay, our representative on the panel, and we are delighted that the Minister agrees that we should have a full debate on the report when it is in our hands, perhaps early next year.

We also recognise that conflict resolution and prevention and the promotion of global stability raise very difficult questions of sovereignty and practicality. On page 62 of the Command Paper, the Government suggest that the UN needs to be clearer about when it should intervene. In particular, they say:

> "The Security Council should consider drawing up guidelines for international debate, on the instances of state failure and other threats in which the Security Council should consider authorising military interventions."

It is fundamental that we have a debate on when the Security Council should authorise intervention and how that intervention should take place. Should the UN be the body to intervene? Some people believe the UN to be an independent, third-party organisation with a standing army of its own that is ready to zoom into any conflict situation. Of course that is not the case. As we have seen in most of the major conflicts in recent years, if the Americans and Brits do not do it, it does not get done. How we should intervene and when we should intervene are vital questions, and we support the Government in calling for a debate on them. Issues of sovereignty and international law are not easy to consider.

The next thing that needs to be thrashed out is how the Security Council in particular should take decisions and who should serve on it. That is a very important part of the current debate and the Government refer to it on page 71. They do not exactly stick out their neck, but say that they believe in the expansion of the Security Council. I think that we all believe in that, but they do not suggest how that should be done. Perhaps we are a little braver, but we certainly see—[Interruption.] They do not say that in the small print of the Command Paper, but they may have said it elsewhere.

We certainly support countries such as India and Brazil and either South Africa or Egypt coming on board as permanent members of the Security Council, particularly if it is understood that they are representing their region or sub-region, which is why they are joining that important group of people. The composition of the Security Council needs to reflect modern and approaching realities of where global power lies.

It is worth repeating the point that I made last year in a similar debate that the UN cannot work without the full engagement of the world's only superpower. If the United States of America is not fully engaged in the UN, the UN is simply a talking shop, and a pretty toothless one. It is therefore vital that the US is engaged in the reform process and signs up to whatever comes out of it. The United Kingdom has a very real role to play in persuading our American friends that it is critical that they form part of the multilateral response to what is going on in the world and that they do not simply seek to go it alone.

It would also be very welcome if we could see an end to the pork-barrel politics that the General Assembly often reflects. It would be very good indeed if members could be encouraged to see the bigger picture of global peace and security, hard though that is, rather than seeing simply what they can take back to their own countries and regions.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Is not a real, glaring example of what my hon. Friend says staring us in the face? If the UN could play a bigger role in providing a broader peacekeeping force in Iraq, that force would be much more broadly recognised and welcomed by the Iraqi people than the present force, whose members tend to be regarded as occupiers, not peacekeepers.

Mr. Streeter: My hon. Friend is quite right and we are all aware of the genesis of that situation. The lesson that we must learn is that such unilateral and bilateral interventions are much less good than multilateral interventions supported by the entire Security Council, followed by reconstruction and peacekeeping on a UN, not a unilateral basis. My hon. Friend is absolutely correct.

As we all know, the Government have suddenly become very keen on gambling. It might therefore be worth making a small wager about whether the radical reform that we want to see at the UN is likely to take place on a greater or lesser time scale than the radical reform of the House of Lords. Given the Government's sudden enthusiasm for gambling, that is perhaps worth a small wager. Both are long-term projects and we wish the Government well in reforming the United Nations.

> "Examples of the threats or warning signs that the UN should be focusing on might include . . . overthrow of democracy".

That is an interesting point, given that many UN members are not democratic countries themselves. Have the Government thought about including some kind of threshold as a way of incentivising the steady march towards democratic values? I mean not the Westminster-style of democracy, but the rule of law, freedom of speech, human rights and some kind of representative Government. Would it be appropriate for nations to have to cross a threshold before being allowed into certain global corridors of power? Would that not incentivise them to pursue the important process of becoming more democratic? I recognise that there is a slight problem with that way of thinking as regards China, but it would still be in the Government's interests to ensure that even the UN's structures incentivised its members to become ever more democratic.

I want to focus for two or three minutes on the important issue of the oil-for-food scam. It is strange, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) said, that it is not worth a single line in the Government's Command Paper, given that the issue has been one of the greatest setbacks to the UN's credibility recently. It has been revealed in figures supplied by the Iraqi Interim Government that up to $60 billion may have been affected by corruption and removed from the oil-for-food programme before finding its way into the wrong pockets, including $10 billion that may have gone to Saddam Hussein and his entourage. The Security Council was being paid £3 billion to administer the programme—it was being controlled by the United Nations—yet that vast sum went missing.

We need a fully parliamentary debate on the issue for two reasons. First, it is crucial to the UN's credibility that lessons are learned and that such corruption does not happen again. Secondly, we now know that there is a real link between the funds that went missing and the weapons being used against British troops serving in Iraq. As the Foreign Secretary is probably aware, the Secretary of State for Defence said last week:

> "There is no doubt that some people who are continuing to fight are fighting for the restoration not of Saddam's regime in particular, but of the privileges and money that they enjoyed as a result of the corruption that existed during his time in office. There is no doubt that many of those people benefited significantly and are using some of those funds to buy weapons to kill not only members of the coalition, but Iraqis."—[Official Report, 18 October 2004; Vol. 425, c. 642.]

Oil-for-food money—taxpayers' money—that went missing is now being used in the battle against our own troops.

I have four questions for the Minister to answer either this afternoon or in writing. On 24 March 2000, Sir Jeremy Greenstock, our excellent UN ambassador, reported to the Security Council serious concerns about corruption. What action did the Foreign Office take when he blew the whistle four years ago? Secondly, senior figures in France and Russia have now been implicated in the scandal. What is the Foreign Office assessment of the impact that that had on the workings of the Security Council up to and including the crucial vote on UN Security Council resolutions on Iraq?

Thirdly, given that the Volcker inquiry has suggested that it will take more than three years to investigate, can we afford to wait that long? Should we not have an inquiry right now to investigate the British angle of the scandal? We do not yet know whether anyone domiciled in Great Britain is implicated, and Kofi Annan will have retired by the time the Volcker inquiry reports.

Fourthly, given the statement by the Defence Secretary, why have the Government refused to raise the issue directly with Kofi Annan? I will not read out the written answer received by my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson), who has been diligent on the issue, but it is clear that at a recent meeting on 19 October the Foreign Secretary did not raise the issue. I cannot understand that, because it is a major issue with British implications. We are not accusing the Government of any wrongdoing whatsoever, but this has happened on their watch and I would urge them to move with more vigour in trying to get to the bottom of it and trying to find out what has gone wrong and why.

I could say many other things about the UN, but I want to give other hon. Members a chance to have their tuppenny worth. We all want to see a strong and effective UN that is a medium with which and through which all the world's nations are content to work, a force for global security and peace, and a voice for the powerless. That will take radical reform. We welcome the process that has started, but suspect that it will not go far or fast enough.

Next year, as the Minister has said, is a crucial one. The United Kingdom, with its chairmanship of various organisations, will be in a unique position to influence the change process for the better. We call on the Government to be more radical in their preparations and to seize this unique opportunity.

4.7 pm

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale) (LD): I, too, echo the comments made by the hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) and welcome this important debate. I pay tribute to the Minister for being here in his current condition, which looks very painful. He has been a champion of the need for the House to debate these issues. Last year, we enjoyed not just one debate, but two, I recall; with the second in the main Chamber. In an outbreak of cross-party consensus, I join the calls for us to reinstate the debate in the main Chamber at a time when there is not other important business going on. Perhaps this important subject would then enjoy greater attention.

The scope and importance of the United Nations is clearly set out in the valuable document produced by the Government, Cm 6325 "The United Kingdom in the United Nations". It acknowledges that awareness of the United Nations in the United Kingdom is lower than it ought to be. In recognising that problem with the British debate, the paper has gone a long way to providing a useful summary of some of the key issues that face the UN and the UK's relationship with it.

The scope of the UN's activities goes way beyond the most obvious in security, which we tend to dwell on in this House. A quick glance at the economic and social issues section of the Command Paper will make that perfectly clear. Whether it is the United Nations Development Programme, UNESCO, UNIFEM, the Food and Agriculture Organisation, UNICEF or the Conference on Trade and Development, there is a massive list of agencies and bodies.

[Mr. Michael Moore]

The hon. Member for South-West Devon seemed to suggest an organisation that was out of control and had grown like Topsy. A more charitable interpretation, which I would like to give, is that it reflects the sheer width and depth of the issues facing the United Nations and our attempts to combat them. There is a breathtaking—even bewildering—span of activities, and we are right to pause and reflect on what it means and what it tells us about the complexities of the world and the challenges facing countries trying to make sense of it all.

Security remains the abiding concern of individuals and Governments across the world. We live in an era where we are more conscious of failed and failing states, the growing and real threats of international terrorism and the real worries about transnational crime. Those are all closely related to the issues of global poverty and humanitarian crises, which are endemic in certain parts of the world, such as Africa. Indeed, there is an all too depressingly familiar vicious circle, where poverty creates instability, which leads to conflict, which deepens the poverty. And so it goes on. The United Nations must be able to tackle each of these priorities and to do so it must be reformed.

When we frame our debate on the reform of the UN we must be quite careful. The hon. Member for South-West Devon was careful in how he assessed this. We sometimes tend to treat the UN as if it were an independent, fully functioning organisation to which we have subcontracted many of our international concerns. The reality is that it is very dependent on the member states who make up its membership. Without the political will of those member states neither can the UN act nor can we hope to see it reformed. The United Nations Secretary General, Kofi Annan, has recognised the reality of the fast changing world and the need for the UN to adapt its responses and capabilities to suit the new world order.

The setting out of objectives in the millennium declaration with an explicit listing of the development goals was an important advance. So too was the world summit on sustainable development, which took place in Johannesburg in 2002. But it has been the recognition of the security costs of the failure to tackle those issues that has understandably dominated international debate in recent times: 9/11, the war in Iraq and the proliferation of nuclear capabilities and weapons have divided the world, but at the same time they have highlighted the need for a new consensus on the nature of the threats and how we should deal with them.

Kofi Annan set out his concerns on these issues a year ago to the General Assembly of the United Nations and set up the high level panel, which has been referred to by both the Minister and the Conservative spokesman. When he was in London last week he emphasised the importance of its work and looked forward to its report in December. The Command Paper has been extremely useful in setting out the United Kingdom Government's position and their aspirations for the high level panel report. We would broadly support the objectives that are set out there.

We must undoubtedly improve the performance of the United Nations in the areas of conflict prevention and peace building. We have to take decisive action against terrorism and the counter terrorism committee has been an important step in that regard. As the issues in India, Pakistan and, most pressingly at present, in Iran confirm, we have to strengthen our understanding of nuclear proliferation and the measures that we can take to counter it. I hope that the Minister will also be able to reflect on the worrying reports in the last few weeks in Iraq about the loss of some of the technology that might have a nuclear input.

Equally, returning to the Government's priorities for the high level panel, we cannot ignore the linkages between poverty and conflict and the close relationship they have with environmental degradation. Perhaps the most important issue that the Government highlight, which we also recognise as crucial, is item d) on page 4 of the Command Paper. It relates to > "the circumstances in which military action should be authorised to prevent a threat from materialising by acting at an early stage, and to deal with overwhelming humanitarian catastrophes".

That is the nub of the huge debate that we have had here in the United Kingdom in the past few years, but also internationally. We may have our differences of opinion about how we got into conflicts, not least in Iraq, but the lessons to be learned from Iraq, Rwanda and Kosovo must tell us that we all have a collective responsibility to re-examine this issue. Like the hon. Member for South-West Devon, I hope that when the panel publishes its reports, we will again have the opportunity to debate the reform of the UN—not least because of this issue.

Sorting out what the UN should be focused on and what it should legitimately sanction is a key priority, but ensuring that it has the capability to act is equally important. The political legitimacy of the organisation is crucial; the expansion of the permanent membership will be a test of that. There is probably reasonable cross-party consensus on that. For our part, we support the so-called G4 of Brazil, Germany, India and Japan in their efforts to obtain permanent membership. Indeed, we would probably go further and agree with the hon. Member for South-West Devon that a significant African country—be it Egypt or South Africa—should be included as well. We add the caveat that we should ensure that all such candidates comply with any obligations they have under existing UN Security Council resolutions.

In their papers, the Government set out some other key aspects of the Security Council that we support, such as the need for greater transparency in the way in which it operates, the ability to open sessions to other members of the UN so that they can comment on and participate in key debates on issues facing the world and, perhaps most importantly when we consider what is happening at the moment, the need to reform our sanctions regimes. We must ensure that both an effective body of sanctions and a credible mechanism for ensuring that they are enforced are available to us. We also welcome the thrust of the reform proposals contained in the paper to do with peacekeeping, the General Assembly, the secretariat and the multitude of UN development funds and programmes, not least as we build up to the 2005 summit, at which the progress made on the 2000 millennium declaration will be considered.

The UK's role in the UN, which has been commented on today and to which I paid tribute in last year's debates, is significant. We are reminded once again in the Command Paper of the sheer size of the UK budgetary contribution—at £623 million, it is not an insignificant amount. We also have consistently strong diplomatic representation at the UN. In the next year, the UK will have a pivotal role in the G8 and EU presidencies. We look forward to the Government maximising their contribution to the debates when we hold those important positions.

At the outset, I suggested that there is a reasonable degree of consensus about the UN, although we have our differences about specific issues, over which we have had confrontations from time to time. Whatever those disagreements, we must all unite in recognising the need for an effective multilateral organisation that is able to tackle global problems and their underlying causes, not least when our security is at stake. The UN faces unprecedented challenges and a need for reform, but it is a powerful and invaluable organisation, which we continue to support wholeheartedly.

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): I, too, welcome the fact that the Government arranged this debate, and welcome the publication of the second report on "The United Kingdom in the United Nations". At a time when many decry the work of the UN, the document is a testament to its valuable work, both directly and through its agencies, in helping to tackle some of the problems of the poorest in the world and of victims of war and terror; indeed, they are often the same people.

The document also reminds us of the important work done by many UN agencies in other fields of activity that do not always attract so much media coverage—everything from bodies essential to the world economy and communications, such as the International Maritime Organisation and the International Civil Aviation Organisation and others, such as UNESCO. I make special mention of UNESCO, not least because about 10 per cent. of my constituency is situated in one of its world heritage sites; and the city of Edinburgh has just been nominated as UNESCO's first international city of literature.

That is an indication of the breadth of interest of the United Nations and its agencies. I have no difficulty with the proposition that, with so many interests and concerns bringing so many countries together, a range of international agencies should be working in such ways. It is useful to have positive examples of successful international co-operation on record. I welcome the Government's robust recommitment to the UN, and the general all-party support for the UN that has been expressed this afternoon.

The key issue in our debate and in the more general debate outside is the recognition that, for all the UN's achievements, the international community has failed to tackle some of the most important issues of our day. Those hon. Gentlemen who have spoken referred to some of those failures. That is why it is right to consider how and to what extent the UN can be changed so as to allow it to become a more effective mechanism, whereby the international community can respond to the pressing challenges of the day.

I mentioned the failures of the international community; I say the international community rather than the UN, because the UN is the voice of the international community. However, those failures are an argument for strengthening the UN's ability to tackle such problems; they are not an argument for weakening the UN. It is essential that, in their international actions, Governments ensure that what they do strengthen the UN rather than contributes to its weakening.

I welcome the setting up of the high level panel by the Secretary-General, and the contribution that the Government made to that panel, which is set out in the annexe to the paper. Getting a consensus—a consensus not only on the lowest common denominator but a consensus for real change—is probably one of the most important objectives in international diplomacy today. I, too, hope that at an appropriate time, we have the opportunity to discuss those recommendations in a major debate on the Floor of the House.

I welcome the emphasis in the Government's contribution to the high level panel, but if we are to move to a UN that a move to what effectively is a more interventionist UN, the emphasis has to be on developing a proactive and preventive response to stop threats turning into actual attacks or conflicts. I, too, strongly endorse the proposals in the Government's paper for the UN to have a strengthened analytical capacity to identify threats and to make possible responses to threats at an early stage.

"deals with threats to international peace and security",

I welcome also the proposals to improve UN peacekeeping operations. I would be particularly interested, either today or later, in hearing from the Minister how we could strengthen the civilian peacekeeping capacity of the UN and, indeed, of the UK, as well as the military peacekeeping capacity. It is essential also to strengthen the multilateral proliferation regimes. Again, the Government refer to the verification regime for the biological and toxin weapons convention and the strengthening of the safeguards division of the International Atomic Energy Agency. I would welcome an update.

I accept that a more proactive response to some of the challenges that face the world community may require military intervention, and that in some cases, if military action had been taken at an earlier stage, some of the problems that face us now might not have arisen. Equally, there are many examples where crises in the international community could have been prevented or conflicts or wars averted, if a more proactive peacekeeping, developmental or diplomatic approach had been adopted earlier. It is therefore right for the Government to emphasise in their paper that military action should be the last rather than the first resort.

I would go further than that and strongly argue that any military action should be undertaken only with the clear endorsement of the international community, which is expressed normally through the UN or a regional arrangement, such as the African Union, which is referred to in the paper.

[Mr. Mark Lazarowicz]

The events in Iraq in recent years are obviously the backdrop to this debate. Without going into that debate now, I do not think that anyone would dispute that our position in Iraq could well have been different and better if a degree of consensus on the right course of action could have been achieved in the UN at an earlier stage. It is for that reason that I cannot accept the argument that is put forward in some quarters that we should legitimise a more general right for states to take action to intervene militarily in other countries, unless that action either has the clear endorsement of, preferably, the UN or enjoys a clear international or regional consensus. Without such endorsement, I am worried that we will legitimise the right of, bluntly, big powers to interfere in the internal affairs of other powers, not for genuine human rights reasons, but because that suits their national interests.

When I refer to big powers, I do not use that as a code for any particular big powers, such as the USA, or smaller, more medium-sized powers, such as the UK. By big powers I mean any state that is in a position of military superiority to its neighbours. There are many small powers in the world that are nevertheless substantial military players in their own areas. We must be very careful indeed about endorsing the development of legitimising a general right of states to intervene in other countries in that way. The example of Iraq has surely shown that easy assumptions about remodelling the world with quick, surgical military action can be proved wrong in reality.

In saying that, I certainly do not argue that the world should stand idly by in the face of humanitarian crises or the flouting of the international community's will by repressive regimes or failed states. However, any action must surely have clear foundations in internationally accepted legal principles, in a clear and internationally endorsed legal order that reflects the clear consensus of the international community.

Above all, the emphasis must be on conflict prevention, tackling the underlying factors that lead to international tension and on ensuring that the UN and Governments consistently support human rights and democracy throughout the world. What that means in practical terms is that the Government should continue their efforts to strengthen the UN and allow it and its agencies to work more effectively. The programme for change that the Government set out in their annexe to the paper has my general support. We also need to press for reforms within the UN institutions, to ensure that the promotion of human rights is taken more seriously in those agencies. We certainly cannot accept, for example, the scandal of countries with abysmal human rights records taking a leading role in the UN Commission on Human Rights.

Reforming the UN also means that the UK should ensure that, as part of our efforts to combat terrorism, we do not find ourselves getting too close to regimes with questionable human rights records. We all know that a questionable human rights record almost guarantees that at some stage the country in question will become the focus of either internal or external conflict and, in some cases, a recruiting ground for further terrorism. In general terms, the agenda that the Government have set out in their document deserves to be supported and to be debated both in the Chamber and more generally in the country.

The changes will require considerable effort at international level. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary is actively involved in such efforts in many forums. I am glad that he spoke of the importance of pursuing the agenda through the European Union, because we have significant influence as a state there, and it is perhaps appropriate in a week when the Heads of Government are signing the constitutional treaty to mention the importance of the EU developing a stronger and more coherent policy on human rights. It is to be hoped that then the EU common position on human rights in international forums, such as the United Nations, would be stronger.

Some might regard it as strange to refer to an EU role in this context on the day after the EU failed to agree on the membership of the European Commission for the next five years. However, in my view the events in Brussels of the past few days have emphasised how an increasing common concern is felt throughout Europe on issues such as equality and human rights. There is an opportunity for the UK, in the second half of next year, to build on that common concern to ensure that Europe uses its considerable collective influence to work for the reforms that we all agree are necessary in the UN and the international system.

The Government have presented a generally excellent report today and it deserves much wider publicity throughout the country. I shall try to ensure that it receives that in my area and that it contributes to the debate about the future of the UN. That debate is not only for parliamentarians but is one in which the entire country should be involved.

4.32 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I am pleased to be here in the Chamber after an absence of several months, with you in the Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and following the speech of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz). The contributions this afternoon have been well informed, and this is a high-profile debate. I declare the fact that I was part of an all-party group that visited the United Nations last November.

This debate on the United Kingdom in the United Nations has for its background the Government's Command Paper Cm 6325, from which I have already quoted. It is an informative document. It is comprehensive, but it is very bland and I wish that it had a little more spice and a little more idea of the action that the British Government will take to support and enhance the actions of the United Nations. We can all agree, in this Chamber and much more widely, that we want a properly functioning United Nations—indeed, one that functions better than at present.

The United Kingdom has a pivotal role to play in bringing that about. Not only, as we have heard today, is it one of the largest donors, but it has, next year, the presidency of the European Union and the G8. It is also probably the closest ally of the United States, where we have considerable influence—and where we shall no doubt continue to have such influence after the election next week.

The report is interesting in that it shows what a broad field the United Nations gets involved in—everything from the International Court of Justice, to forests and the environment, to refugees and human rights. Those are all very laudable, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) said, perhaps if the United Nations did a little less, but did it better, we should be better off.

I want to focus on a few matters. As a former chairman of the all-party group on population, development and reproductive health, I welcome the UN's work in the United Nations Population Fund and the International Conference on Population and Development—particularly the goals that were set at Cairo. I note from the report that 2004 is the ICPD's 10th anniversary year. The report states, on page 37:

> "At its anniversary session this year the CPD adopted a resolution reaffirming the importance of the ICPD and implementation of the Programme of Action."

I have heard that somewhere before, fairly close to where Opposition Members are sitting. Nevertheless, "action" is a good word, and I welcome the work that the UN is doing on promoting sustainable populations and reproductive health.

Another page that I turned to in the report relates to the UN commission on narcotic drugs. Again, the document is very bland. The opening statement, at paragraph 250, says:

> "The Commission on Narcotic Drugs (CND) is the central UN policy-making body dealing with drug-related matters. It analyses the world drug situation, develops proposals to strengthen the international drug control system and is the custodian of the three UN conventions that form the basis of national and international drug control."

What a pity, as the United Kingdom has been playing a major role in trying to reduce the amount of heroin coming out of Afghanistan, that since that time, production and the amount of heroin coming to the UK have rocketed to such an extent that the price on the streets has dropped so that it is only a very little more expensive than cigarettes. That is having a very unfortunate effect on young people in this country. I hope that the Minister will say something about what we are doing to address that problem. The Royal Navy is doing an excellent job picking up ships in the Mediterranean, but that is only part of the problem. The moment that we close off one route, the drug barons, who make huge profits from drugs, find another.

Let me move on to a different subject altogether: international law and how it can be upheld through the UN. In his Sedgefield address of 5 March, the Prime Minister, perhaps rightly, raised doubts about the ability to address vast humanitarian problems around the world through the current international legal framework. He said:

> "It may well be that under international law as presently constituted, a regime can systematically brutalise and oppress its people and there is nothing anyone can do, when dialogue, diplomacy and even sanctions fail, unless it comes within the definition of a humanitarian catastrophe . . . This may be the law, but should it be?"

The need to ensure that that framework is successfully amended is pressing, because only under the rule of law can a Government act legitimately, either at home or abroad. I do not think that I have ever agreed with anything that the Prime Minister has said as much as I did with those statements.

Her Majesty's loyal Opposition have consistently upheld, throughout their existence, the rule of law. We were therefore very concerned about the basis on which we went into Iraq. I do not want to go over that particularly, but on 13 March 2003 I questioned the then Leader of the House, the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook). I said:

> "The Leader of the House said this morning, in very profound terms, that the Prime Minister would not go to war unless he believed that he had proper legal cover."

The then Leader of the House replied:

> "It follows logically from what I said that the Prime Minister is satisfied that he has adequate legal authority in international law for any action that may be taken . . . I repeat, that the Prime Minister will take no action that he believes to be inconsistent with international law."—[Official Report, 13 March 2003; Vol. 401, c. 441.]

I wonder whether the Government would stand by that statement now.

Irrespective of whether the Government were right and whether they had legal cover to go into Iraq, we are where we are; there is not much point rehearsing that argument. The argument that we need to rehearse—I made this point strongly in my speech last week in the debate on defence in the world—concerns the need to concentrate on a rehabilitation and reconstruction plan for Iraq. The whole thing seems to be going perilously slowly. The Government need to put much more effort into that. As I said last week, unless we get right the basic things, such as electricity, water, sewerage and adequate housing, schools and health—which we all take for granted in this modern civilised country of ours—the Iraqi people will not feel safe or that they want a stable democracy.

I therefore want to refer to the arms-for-food programme, whereby so much money has been embezzled. We know that Saddam Hussein had a system of discount vouchers, but unfortunately it is still going on in the UN. We have heard all the stories about UN officials being involved, so my intervention on the Minister was pertinent. The investigation by Kofi Annan should be made public, so that we can all see clearly and openly what exactly the UN has been up to.

As I said in an intervention on my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Devon, I believe that establishing a more broadly based peacekeeping force in Iraq through the United Nations is essential. I am not sure whether we can achieve democratic elections in Iraq in February, but whether we can or cannot, there is no doubt that it will still be necessary to have substantial peacekeeping forces of some sort in Iraq. It would be much better if we had more broadly based forces, from Asian countries and with a more Muslim slant, so that the people of Iraq saw them as more acceptable. As I said earlier, they would be seen as genuine peacekeepers, rather than, as some sections of the Iraqi people unfortunately view us now, as occupiers because we are not of their beliefs, religion and culture.

I raised earlier another problem in that region, which is that of Iran. There is no doubt that until we get a stable situation with Iran, we will find it very difficult to achieve a stable situation in Iraq. The dictum always used to be that if Iraq and Iran had roughly equal strength of force, that would keep the peace. The problem is that, as we know, Iran is building up its air force and army. Unfortunately, it also looks as if it is moving towards a nuclear capability.

[Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown]

I stress to the Minister—I hope that the Government will take this seriously—that through the International Atomic Energy Agency, which is a UN agency, we must insist on having full completion of Iran's declarations under the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. As I said in a speech last week, if it does not do that, we must build a broad diplomatic effort involving Russia, China, our major European allies France and Germany, and the United States to put increasing pressure on it.

My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Devon was a little unkind about the UN in saying that he could not think of much good that it had done. I think that that is what he said—I hope that I am not misquoting him—and I somewhat disagree with him. One thing that it has done, which might be connected with military action in Iraq, involves the sanctions on Libya, a country which has been one of the great success stories. Smaller conflicts, such as in Sierra Leone and Liberia, have also been success stories for the UN.

The problem is that the UN relies heavily on the good will of its members. We are a fully participating member, and we try to help wherever we can, perhaps to the detriment of some of our military forces, which feel overstretched at the moment. However, that is a different subject for a different day. The problem is that the UN can act effectively as a peacekeeping force only when it has assets or access to assets under its close control. That involves funding, and although I do not want to criticise the United States, because it is a close ally, I believe that it is not quite pulling its weight in funding the UN. The US is getting better at paying its dues, but there is still a $194 million shortfall in its payments to the UN as of May 2004. Indeed, the UN website says:

> "Along with several other factors, this situation has created a possibility that the United States may accrue new arrears to the United Nations and several of its specialized agencies."

As I said last week, I hope that the British Prime Minister will be the first to be phoned by the US President, whoever he is, after the election. I hope that the Prime Minister will first congratulate him, but secondly say that we should have a new middle east peace initiative. We have not talked much about the middle east, but I will move on to that. I hope that the third thing that the Prime Minister and the next President do is say that they want a properly functioning United Nations and that they must fund it properly.

Today's news from the middle east that Yasser Arafat is not well is disturbing. I hope that he makes a quick recovery but that, whatever happens—even if he is not able to continue to lead the Palestine Liberation Organisation—neither side will use this as an opportunity to increase its military activity. We need a wider middle east settlement, because the lack of such a settlement is one of the things that gives the terrorists the excuse to carry out their vile activities—incidentally, that is also the situation in Iraq.

We would go a long way towards solving the world's terrorist problems if we had a lasting, viable peace settlement in the middle east. That will involve the Palestinians having a viable state—the Israelis must accept that. Having said that, I warmly welcome Prime Minister Sharon's initiative in leaving the Gaza strip, and I hope that we will now make real progress. However, that will require the involvement of the UK Government, their EU partners, and particularly the United States and other allies such as the Chinese and the Russians. We tend to forget those last two allies, but they are very important in terms of establishing a lasting world peace.

I have just come back from China. It is interesting that the Chinese are becoming much more prepared to engage in world diplomatic efforts, as we have seen in the past few weeks over North Korea. At present, therefore, the UK Government have an opportunity—a window—to make great diplomatic efforts with the Chinese, who are very friendly towards the British. That would do us a power of good in terms of diplomacy but also in terms of the increasing trade that we could do in China. China has increased its GDP by 10 times in the past 10 years, but it still has huge problems. It has 600 million citizens doing quite well, but 700 million citizens who are virtually on the poverty line, so there is a lot of work to be done there.

This has been an interesting debate. The Government are right to hold an annual debate. I hope that next year the debate will be held in the House, and that we will all have more time to develop some of the themes at greater length, because they are incredibly important. I wish the Government well with their efforts with the United Nations. I hope that when we return to the debate next year, they will be able to tell us of the substantial progress that they have made, assuming that they—rather than we—win the election.

Valerie Davey (Bristol, West) (Lab): I am pleased to have the opportunity to make a brief contribution to the debate. I begin by thanking my hon. Friend the Minister for introducing the annual debate in the week that United Nations day occurs.

Hon. Members have made valuable contributions to a wide-ranging debate. I was therefore somewhat hesitant to draw attention to one specific corner of the world. However, I am emboldened to do so by the fact that, last week, a United Nations officer again drew to the attention of the Security Council the world's largest neglected crisis—the crisis in northern Uganda. That area has not yet been spoken about in today's debate, nor is it an area that is hitting the headlines at present. Yet, after Sudan, which is now—thankfully—receiving worldwide attention, the conflict in northern Uganda remains the most tragic in the world.

The officer who brought it to the Security Council's attention was Jan Egeland, who is the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs and the UN's emergency relief co-ordinator. I draw attention to the problem in order to highlight a situation about which we would like the UN to pass a resolution, but in which both the UN and the British Government feel unable to intervene directly. That is not to detract from the aid and support that this Government and many others have given to northern Uganda. However, as Jan Egeland said:

> "Where else in the world have there been 20,000 kidnapped children? Where else in the world have 90 per cent. of the population in large districts been displaced? Where else in the world do children make up 80 per cent. of the terrorist insurgency movement?"

It is an appalling situation; it happens in one area of a country that is a full member of the United Nations, and to which we have given credit in respect of the development of heavily indebted poor countries and other matters—for example, Uganda's tackling of HIV/AIDS.

Yet the 18-year rebellion of the Lord's Resistance Army against the Government has, as I said, forced 1.6 million Ugandans, half of them children, into squalid, overcrowded camps in order to escape the attacks and the killings. That number includes 40,000 night commuters—children who sleep under verandas, in schools, in hospital courtyards and in bus parking places, so as to evade the snare of the LRA.

It is heartrending that children are the perpetrators and the victims in that war; they are caught in the snare set by the LRA. It is a humanitarian tragedy. Only the United Nations can take action, but it has failed to bring about a solution. Kofi Annan led a seminar in the United Nations last year on child soldiers; it is an issue that we all think of as horrific when it is brought to our attention, yet year after year—18 years now—there is no solution to this absolute tragedy.

I am emboldened to bring the issue to the attention of the Chamber today in the context of a debate on the United Nations, to put it in the context of all we have said and to use it to highlight the urgent need for the reform of the United Nations for encouraging work on conflict resolution—if only action had been taken earlier—and especially for the restoration of peace.

In briefing the Security Council last week, Jan Egeland said that there were now some positive signals that the Ugandan Government were giving the situation a higher priority, and that there were more talks going on. He was convinced, as is everybody who has considered the situation, that there is no military solution in northern Uganda. The only solution is through reconciliation, and through the efforts of the Minister and those of others, especially in the Department for International Development. Work is going on in that respect. I trust that in his further contact with the United Nations, the Minister will highlight the issue again.

I welcome the valuable report, which I hope will be read more widely than just by the hon. Members present in the debate. I hope, too, that the UK will make a valuable contribution in the high-level panel, and that when we have this debate next year, there will have been real progress in some of the many areas that hon. Members have highlighted.

Mr. Rammell: With the leave of the Chamber, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to respond to some of the points that were made in the debate.

The debate has been very well informed and constructive, as were the debates last year. There is a strong cross-party consensus on this critical area of international policy. The Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter), pointed to the UN successes, for example in Afghanistan and Haiti, and rightly stated where the UN has failed in the past—Kosovo, Bosnia, Rwanda, Israel and Palestine, and Zimbabwe. In these debates, we sometimes criticise the UN as though it were a freestanding institution, but the United Nations is simply as good as the sum of its parts. The international community and individual nation states determine whether there is an effective international organisation.

The hon. Gentleman rightly asked what the United Nations is for.More than anything, the UN's role is to deliver peace, security and greater equality around the world, which is where the millennium development goals are so critically important. If we in the advanced developed world, where the fear of security and terrorist attack is so strong, want the UN to demonstrate that it is willing to combat those issues, as part of that bargain—even if we did not want to do it for other reasons, which we do—we must tackle fundamental concerns about poverty and inequality around the world.

The hon. Gentleman rightly questioned the number of different agencies and committees in the UN structure. At the very least, that point underlines the need for better co-ordination and prioritisation. One case that highlights the need for prioritisation is the decision by the Security Council to end what was effectively the Hansard reporting of every UN Committee. That programme is 27 years behind in its reporting and costs $2 million but, when the Security Council's proposal got to the General Assembly, it was blocked. Unless we are prepared collectively and internationally to take such decisions and stop that degree of unjustifiable activity so that money can be better spent, we will continue to struggle.

A number of hon. Members referred to the debate on the circumstances that justify military intervention. That is one of the most important debates that we must have.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to our views on the expansion of the Security Council. I am sure that he missed it inadvertently, but our views are set out in detail on page 4. For some time we have been in favour of having five additional permanent members. Germany and Japan should be included because of the substantial contribution that they already make to the UN structure, and India and Brazil should represent their particular parts of the world. A country from Africa should also be included, but it is not yet clear which country is in a pre-eminent position. We are also in favour of having five additional non-permanent members.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Ever since I have been a Member of Parliament, there has been talk of having additional members of the Security Council, and I strongly support that. When does the Minister realistically think that that might be a prospect for some of the countries that he has just mentioned?

Mr. Rammell: Somebody referred earlier to whether one was prepared to take a bet on that matter. It is enormously difficult to create a consensus for the expansion of the permanent membership of the Security Council. There is a degree of cross-party consensus about which countries should be additional permanent members. However, for every one that is identified, another country in that region believes that it is equally validly justified in seeking a permanent seat. That is part of the problem.

[Mr. Rammell]

It will be interesting to see what the high level panel comes forward with and whether we can establish a consensus and move forward on the issue. I have no doubt that having the same Security Council structure that we inherited from the outcome of the second world war almost 60 years ago is not credible or justifiable. We need to move forward, but I do not underestimate the difficulty of that.

The hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) intervened on the hon. Member for South-West Devon and said that what we needed in Iraq was a UN force that would not be seen as an occupying force. There are two issues in that statement. First, I do not think that the vast majority of Iraqis view our troops, which come from 30 different nations, as an occupying force. However, that minority of insurgents and terrorists who regard them as an occupying force would take that view whatever the composition of the force. At the beginning of the debate, I referred to the attack on the United Nations last year. The idea that we would not face difficulty from the insurgents if we simply had a UN force is not borne out by the facts.

The hon. Member for South-West Devon talked about the possibility of thresholds for democracy and commitment to human rights values. That issue has been debated in the past, particularly with regard to the Commission on Human Rights. It is a good idea in principle, but turkeys tend not to vote for an early Christmas. The unanimity needed to agree that threshold would be very difficult to achieve, because the countries that would be needed to vote for it would be the ones that would be excluded on the basis of the threshold from certain decision-making forums.

There has been much comment on the oil-for-food programme. It is important that I set out in some detail exactly where we are on that. On 9 August, the Independent Inquiry Committee published an interim report that provides information on the oil-for-food programme and the status of the inquiry, including its terms of reference and staffing details. The interim report described only the initiation and early progress of the inquiry, and reached no substantive conclusions on the allegations of corruption.

Subsequently, on 21 October 2004, the Independent Inquiry Committee published a technical briefing document outlining the revenue generated and spent through the oil-for-food programme. The document also listed all those companies that participated in the programme, but emphasised that inclusion in the list did not in itself constitute an implication of illicit, unethical or corrupt behaviour.

We await subsequent reports from the Independent Inquiry Committee in 2005—the time scale that we have been given—which are expected to address the role of UN staff and contractors in the management of the programme, and the allegations of corruption surrounding certain UN personnel and entities that engaged in business with Iraq under the programme.

Several UK companies were involved in buying oil from Iraq and delivering goods to Iraq under the programme. Several foreign companies based in the UK were also involved. One UK company that had contracts under the programme declared in a statement to the London stock exchange on 22 July 2004 that prices payable on certain contracts were uplifted by an aggregate of £4.2 million. The company could not rule out the possibility that sums may have been returned to Iraq. At this time, however, we have no evidence of wrongdoing by any UK companies. It is important that we allow these investigations to proceed and that we co-operate with them, which we are quite properly doing.

The hon. Member for South-West Devon also asked me four questions on the oil-for-food programme, the first of which relates to the concerns expressed in 2000 by our former ambassador to the UN, Jeremy Greenstock, and what was done as a result. We proposed and gained agreement in the Security Council on a new pricing mechanism that had prevented Saddam Hussein from under-charging for oil and diverting profits. That mechanism was put in place. We also proposed other measures, such as preventing charging of illegal port fees, but could not secure agreement in the Security Council.

Secondly, the hon. Gentleman asked if the attitude of Russia and France in the Security Council was affected by benefiting from the allegations of corruption surrounding the oil-for-food programme. The important point to make is that there are allegations that Russian and French companies benefited, but the investigation has not yet completed its work. There is no evidence of a link to those countries' positions in the Security Council.

The Volcker report will take three years. The hon. Gentleman asked me if we could wait before investigating these matters ourselves. First, the Volcker team plans to report in early 2005 on some aspects such as the role of UN contractors and the overall UN management of the programme. Any information on UK individuals or companies has been passed to the relevant authorities. We do not yet have enough information to mount any prosecutions, but we will, of course, keep this matter under active review.

I was asked why the Foreign Secretary did not discuss the corruption allegations surrounding the oil-for-food programme with the Secretary General when he visited London recently. It is important to be clear that Kofi Annan has set up an independent inquiry in which, quite properly, he has no role. There were therefore no specific points to make about the oil-for-food programme to the Secretary General. Given that it is an independent inquiry, that is the right way to deal with the issue.

The hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) made several points. He highlighted the important link between poverty and conflict. That is a very telling point, to which we need consistently to return. He also raised the issue of the loss of Iraqi weapons technology. We are aware of those reports, and they are being investigated and will be discussed in the Security Council next month.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) raised a number of points. He talked about failures within the UN system and rightly identified that those are not failures of the system itself but of the whole of the international community and its failure to get agreement to act in the right circumstances. He also talked about the need for strengthened analytical capacity within the UN to ensure early intervention, whether by military or non-military means. That is an important point to make.

My hon. Friend also talked about the need for civilian capacity in early intervention. That is one of the reasons why the Foreign Office has established a post-conflict reconstruction unit. It looks specifically at the need, among other things, for civilian activities in post-conflict situations. If that model works—we believe that it can—it could be replicated on the international stage. One of the ways in which we are currently working on the civilian front is through support for civilian contributions to peacekeeping missions. We have 10 civil police officers in Sierra Leone and 105 in Kosovo. That is just two examples. We also provide training support.

The hon. Member for Cotswold raised several points. He stressed how there is such a broad range of activities within the UN system. That is an important point, to which several hon. Members referred. We must recognise, and the UN must recognise, that it is not a world Government. That is not what it should try to do. That should therefore imbue all of us within the UN with a real responsibility to take care of the activities and functions that the UN takes up. It must not be so stretched and unco-ordinated that it cannot take effective action.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to both the UN's assessment of Afghanistan counter narcotics and our role as lead nation in trying to tackle that problem. He referred to the reports that have been published recently, as a result of the UN survey for this year, about increases in cultivation. I will be in Brussels on Thursday with Mr. Costa to give the details of that report. We have for some time been saying that we expected an increase in cultivation this year. That does not mean that our efforts or anyone else's have failed, but it does mean that this problem will take time to tackle. That is certainly the experience in any country that has successfully tackled the drugs problem in this way. It took a considerable time to turn round the situation in Pakistan and Thailand.

My reason for having a degree of confidence about Afghanistan is that the building blocks of our strategy in terms of eradication, interdiction, alternative livelihoods, police, judicial capacity and the need for high-level arrests, are all in place. We obviously must assess the degree of commitment that we give to each of those tasks but that has to be the right way forward. The real test of whether what we are doing on the drugs front in Afghanistan is working will come this time next year when all those elements have been in place for a sufficiently long period. I believe that it will work, but that will be the crunch point.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the war with Iraq. He asked whether we still stood by our legal justification for that war. I can assure him that we do. The combination of resolutions 678, 687 and 1441 gave effective legal force to military action. Bluntly—this is the point that is sometimes forgotten in these debates—resolution 1441 gave Saddam and his regime a last chance to comply. That chance was not taken, which was the reason that we went to war, and for no other reason.

The hon. Gentleman referred also to his concerns about Iran. I share some of them. We have been taking a lead on the question with the French and Germans, and I reiterate that we are calling on Iran to give full, open and timely co-operation to the International Atomic Energy Agency. Bluntly, that is not happening. The IAEA board of governors met between 13 and 17 September to discuss the director general's latest report on Iran, which reviewed the steps that have been taken during the past three months.

The board adopted a resolution that established a clear decision point. Iran can meet international requests or face referral to the UN Security Council. We are working with our partners to set out in detail what Iran needs to do before the November board meeting. The subject is open for discussion and resolution in the longer term if Iran does so. We and many of our international partners seek to put concerted pressure on the Iranian Government to achieve that end.

The hon. Gentleman rightly highlighted China's role in international affairs at the UN. Like him, I was in China earlier this week. He was right, however, that the Chinese Government are much more prepared to engage in international affairs and to take a lead than historically has been the case. North Korea is the best example of that. We are trying to match that. We have established a comprehensive, strategic partnership, and we are constantly engaging with the Chinese on those issues.

Finally, my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Valerie Davey) rightly highlighted real concerns about the situation in northern Uganda. My hon. Friend often speaks about the issue. Unfortunately, as with so many conflicts in Africa, not enough international attention is given to such problems. If the loss of life that happens in conflicts in Africa happened on the same scale in other parts of the world, media attention would be far more significant, as would international efforts to resolve them. Nevertheless, she was right to refer to the significant aid and support that the Government are making. We will continue to do so.

We have had an extensive and productive debate. I hope that we can return to these critical issues, either in Westminster Hall or on the Floor of the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twelve minutes past Five o'clock.

Questions Not Answered Orally

The Government were asked—

Acceptable Behaviour Orders

10. Mr. Mark Field: How many acceptable behaviour orders have been issued in each police force since their introduction. [193731]

Caroline Flint: The Home Office does not routinely collect statistics on the use or otherwise of acceptable behaviour contracts—ABCs. ABC schemes, also known as acceptable behaviour agreements, are voluntary and have been developed by a range of agencies whose role it is to prevent such behaviour. Figures released today from the National Survey on Antisocial Behaviour show that 5,383 contracts have been signed in England and Wales and 45 of these ABCs have been issued in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. I understand from Westminster's return to this survey that its overall antisocial behaviour strategy has proved successful in improving community confidence.

Registered Social Landlords (ASBOs)

11. Mr. Gerald Howarth: How many antisocial behaviour orders have been applied for by registered social landlords in each year since 2002. [193732]

Phil Hope: The number of antisocial behaviour orders, as notified to the Home Office, where the main complainant was a registered social landlord is as follows: January to December 2003: 24; January to June 2004 (latest data available): 29.

Fly-tipping

12. Mr. Wilshire: If the Government will make fly-tipping an arrestable offence. [193733]

Alun Michael: All offences that on first conviction can receive a prison sentence of five years or more, which includes hazardous waste fly-tipping, are already arrestable under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. DEFRA has recently consulted on a range of proposals in the fly-tipping strategy and clean neighbourhoods consultations, including ensuring the main fly-tipping offence provides a greater deterrent. Measures will be brought forward at the next legislative opportunity.

Colleagues in the Home Office have also recently consulted on proposals to make all offences arrestable, provided that they are a serious enough example. If these proposals are brought forward, there will be no need to make specific changes to waste legislation.

13. Mr. Swayne: What steps the Government are taking to reduce the antisocial dumping of (a) hazardous and (b) other waste. [193734]

Phil Hope: The illegal disposal of both hazardous and non-hazardous waste is a serious criminal offence. The Government are committed to ensuring that it is dealt with appropriately and are taking steps on a number of fronts. Measures to help tackle fly-tipping have been included in the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003, which were commenced from 31 March 2004. DEFRA has also recently consulted on a range of measures in the clean neighbourhoods consultation, which will be brought forward at the next legislative opportunity.

14. Mr. Gibb: What was the average duration of antisocial behaviour orders issued in each year since 1999. [193735]

Caroline Flint: Figures relating to the average duration of antisocial behaviour orders are not collected centrally. However, we collect figures on the number of ASBOs issued by duration of order. The minimum duration of an ASBO is two years but there is no maximum period. An ASBO may be made for an indefinite period. It is for the court to decide the duration depending on the age of the recipient and the severity of their antisocial behaviour.

Unlawful Pollution

15. Mr. Blunt: What discussions the Government have had with (a) the Environment Agency, (b) local authorities and (c) police authorities regarding the policing of unlawful pollution of the environment.

Alun Michael: The Government take a joined-up approach to the whole continuum of antisocial behaviour, from the low level environmental crime including fly-posting, graffiti, abandoned vehicles, noise and light pollution, through to more serious crime. In the case of environmental damage and pollution Departments across Government work closely to support co-operation between the Environment Agency, local authorities and the police authorities, including dealing with the policing of these issues.

Police Costs

16. Mr. Francois: How much the Government estimate is the cost to the police of dealing with (a) fly-tipping (b) abandoned cars and (c) graffiti, (i) nationally and (ii) by police force. [193737]

Caroline Flint: We do not ask police forces to provide details of cost estimates to deal with fly-tipping, abandoned cars and graffiti either nationally or by police force.

We provide grant for police authorities based on overall estimates of their relative needs for the main sweep of policing. It is for the police authority and chief officer locally to determine precisely how to organise their budgets to address local problems.

Graffiti

17. Tom Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, when he will extend to other areas the trial which allows local authorities to charge businesses for graffiti removal after failure to respond to a graffiti removal notice. [193738]

Caroline Flint: The graffiti removal notice provisions in the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003 are being piloted in 12 local authority areas. It is already evident that the pilots have worked extremely well and other local authorities are keen to replicate the partnership arrangements that have been established. We are currently undertaking a regulatory impact assessment on the impact of the powers and consulting on the guidance which has been issued. The consultation period formally closes on the 31 December 2004. The responses will then be considered and a formal announcement made in early 2005.

Monday 11 October 2004

TREASURY

Responsibility for Tax Policy

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): In line with the recommendations of the O'Donnell review and the Chancellor's Budget statement in March, the new arrangements for the development and maintenance of tax policy are now in operation. HM Treasury has assumed responsibility for policy development, working very closely with Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise. Copies of the O'Donnell report are available in the House Libraries.

United Kingdom Listing Authority Objectives 2004–05

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): The Financial Services Authority, acting in its role as the competent authority for listing, is referred to as the United Kingdom Listing Authority. Every year, the operational objectives of the UKLA are discussed with the Treasury. The annual objectives for 2004–05, which the Treasury has endorsed, will be placed in the Library, and also put on the Treasury website.

DEFENCE

Reservists (Operation Veritas and Related Operations)

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): I have signed a further call-out order for reserve forces for operations in Afghanistan. The new order will enable reservists to continue to be called out into service to support the stabilisation and reconstruction operations. It is effective until 30 September 2005. Over 70 reservists were called out under the order made last year. Reservists currently provide about 12 per cent. of the total UK force in Afghanistan. We continue to be most grateful for their continuing commitment and the invaluable contribution they make to the work that UK forces are undertaking in Afghanistan.

Government Response to Defence Committee's Report on Defence Procurement

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): I can announce that Command Paper Cm 6338, which sets out the Government's response to the House of Commons Defence Select Committee report on Defence Procurement, will be published today.

It is the Government's opinion that the House of Commons Defence Select Committee report on Defence Procurement, published in July, was a flawed document. Our response rejects many of the report's findings. It is unusual for the MOD to reject major elements of a report written by the Defence Select Committee. Regrettably, however, we have taken this action because the report made claims that were not and could not be substantiated and was selective in the way it used evidence.

War Pensioners Report 2003–04

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): I am publishing today the "War Pensioners Report" for 2003–04.

Publication of the "War Pensioners Report" is an annual event dating back to before the second world war. It is a joint document presented to Parliament by my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Defence, Health, Scotland and Wales.

The 2003–04 report provides an account of the administration of the War Pensions Scheme and the various services provided for war pensioners during that period. The report provides a variety of data on degrees of disability, pensioner age profiles, rates of pensions etc. and details of what the war pensions committees and the Central Advisory Committee on War Pensions were involved in during the course of the year.

I am placing copies of the report in the Library of the House.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Government Response to ODPM Committee Report on Local Government Revenue

The Minister for Local and Regional Government (Mr. Nick Raynsford): We are publishing today the Government response to the ODPM Select Committee report on local government revenue. We welcome the Committee's report as another very helpful contribution to the important debate about local government finance.

There is significant common ground between this report and that of the balance of funding review that was published on 20 July. We now look to the Lyons inquiry to consider the detailed case for changes to the present system of local government funding, and to make recommendations on any changes that are necessary and how to implement them.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Recent Sanctions Change: Moldova

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): On 26 August the Council of the European Union adopted Common Position 2004/622/CFSP. This amended Common Position 2004/179/CFSP (24 February 2004) that imposed travel restrictions on the leadership of the Transnistrian region of Moldova responsible for preventing progress in arriving at a political settlement of the conflict. In light of the widespread intimidation campaign being conducted against teachers, parents and students of Latin-script Moldovan schools in the Transnistrian region, the list of individuals subject to a travel ban by Common Position 2004/179/CFSP was expanded to include those persons responsible for the campaign against Latin-script schools.

Iraq: Export Licence System

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): On 8 June the United Nations Security Council adopted Resolution 1546 reaffirming the arms embargo on Iraq and introducing new exemptions for supplies of arms and related materiel required by the Government of Iraq or the multinational force (MNF) to serve the purposes of the resolution.

Upon receipt of an application to export arms or related materiel to an end user not explicitly exempt from the embargo, Her Majesty's Government will seek certification on a case-by-case basis from the Government of Iraq or the MNF. The certification is to ensure that the proposed export is required to serve the purposes of Resolution 1546 and is therefore exempted from the embargo. A certification process has been established with the Government of Iraq.

WMD Proliferation: UK Report Under UNSCR1540

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): In my written statement on 25 February 2004, Official Report, columns 46–49WS, on countering the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction (WMD), I expressed the hope that the UN Security Council would adopt a tough resolution against WMD proliferation, and establish an appropriate follow-up mechanism to oversee its implementation.

Both of these aims have now been achieved. UN Security Council Resolution 1540 (UNSCR1540) was adopted on 28 April this year. The resolution called on states to adopt robust national legislation to criminalise the possession, manufacture or trafficking of WMD, and their means of delivery, in particular for terrorist purposes; to develop appropriate, effective export controls on WMD related materials where these do not exist; and to maintain effective physical protection of such materials.

UNSCR1540 also established a committee (the 1540 Committee) to oversee its implementation, and called on all states to report on their implementation of the resolution by 28 October.

On 29 September the UK submitted to the Security Council its report on implementation of UNSCR1540. The UK's report under 1540 has been agreed interdepartmentally, and endorsed by the cross-Whitehall Counter-Proliferation Implementation Committee (CPIC).

We are one of the first states to submit its report to the 1540 Committee, underlining our commitment to UNSCR1540 and to counter-proliferation. I hope that the UK report will help set the standard for other states to follow, both in terms of structure and detail of the report itself, as well as in terms of concrete action to prevent the proliferation of WMD.

However, we will not rest on our laurels. The UK is continuing to review domestic implementation, as well as look at new initiatives to counter the proliferation of WMD and their means of delivery.

I am placing a copy of the UK's report in the Library of the House

HEALTH

Ministerial Accountability for NHS Foundation Trusts

The Secretary of State for Health (Dr. John Reid): As stated in my statement of 30 March 2004, Official Report, column 83WS, NHS foundation trusts (NHSFTs) are public benefit corporations, and, as such, are independent of the Department, and directly accountable to their local populations and to Parliament. Because of this independent status, and NHSFT's separate and local route of accountability, Ministers are no longer in a position to comment on, or provide information about, the detail of operational management within such trusts. Any such questions will be referred to the relevant NHSFT chairman.

To ensure that replies from NHSFTs are available to all Members, they will, from today, be placed in the Library.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Energy: European Commission State Aids Approval

The Minister for Women and Equality (Ms Patricia Hewitt): On 17 June 2004, Official Report, column 48WS, I informed the House that I expected the European Commission to take a decision on the Government's proposed restructuring aid to British Energy in the autumn. I am pleased to say that on 22 September, the commission approved that aid.

This is a very significant milestone in the implementation of British Energy's restructuring plan. We have said from the outset that our aid complied with the commission's rules and this approval confirms that.

It is usual in restructuring aid cases for the commission to require the recipient of the aid to implement certain compensatory measures. In this case, the Commission's approval is subject to the following compensatory measures, which are stringent but workable:

> The company's nuclear generation business will be ring-fenced from its fossil fuel, supply and trading businesses to ensure the aid to the nuclear business is not used to cross subsidise any other of the company's businesses. This measure will last indefinitely. It is likely that this will be enforced through an undertaking between the DTI and British Energy although we have also discussed with OfGEM, the gas and electricity markets regulator, how this could best be enforced.
> No nuclear or fossil-fuelled capacity expansion (above British Energy's current capacity) by the company in the European economic area for six years, and no hydro-electric capacity expansion in the UK for the same period. This will be enforced through an undertaking between the DTI and British Energy.
> A restriction on the company selling to its industrial and commercial customers at prices below the prevailing wholesale market price for six years unless there are exceptional market circumstances as determined by an independent expert. This will be monitored by that expert and enforced by the Government.

In addition, the Commission has required the UK Government to provide more detailed reporting if payments in respect of British Energy's decommissioning and uncontracted liabilities and any incremental historic spent fuel liabilities exceed £1.629 billion. This enhanced reporting is so the Commission can satisfy themselves that the aid is being kept to a minimum and is only being used for authorised purposes. £1.629 billion is the net present value of the total of these liabilities as at December 2002, calculated using the Commission's discount rate of 5.4 per cent. nominal. Owing to the very long timescale over which these liabilities will be discharged, they are the most uncertain in terms of their value. The £1.629 billion does not include the aid we are giving in respect of British Energy's historic spent fuel costs valued by the commission at £2.185 billion, which are fixed, except for inflation. The estimate of the cost to Government (£150 million—£200 million a year on average for the next 10 years falling thereafter) given in my statement of 28 November 2002, remains unchanged.

Both to minimise Government's contribution and financial exposure to the company's liabilities, a number of measures have been put in place in the restructuring agreements. In particular, British Energy will contribute 65 per cent. of its annual free cash flow towards discharging its liabilities and, if there are material increases in British Energy's liabilities, the nuclear decommissioning authority will determine if the additional cost should fall to the company or to Government. British Energy's creditors have taken similar measures to protect their own exposures. Subject to these measures, many of which only apply when the company is cash constrained, British Energy has the freedom to run its business, in terms of corporate, operational and financial policies. It continues as a public limited company managed by its board of directors and subject to the normal private sector disciplines and requirements. The agreements strike a balance between protecting taxpayers' interests and ensuring these private sector disciplines maximise the company's contributions to its liabilities.

Under the Commission's rules, rescue aid ceases once the commission has reached a decision on the restructuring aid. Therefore, no further drawings can be made on the loan facility that the Government have made available to British Energy since September 2002. All drawings on the facility have been repaid with interest by British Energy.

The Government's main objectives in assisting British Energy remain safety and security of supply. A number of conditions of the restructuring remain to be satisfied, including that the Government must not have determined that British Energy will not be viable in all reasonably foreseeable circumstances. The condition remains in effect up to the restructuring effective date and the Government will continue to assess the company's viability until then. If the Government make such a determination at any time up to the restructuring effective date, or if there is a material adverse change in British Energy's position, the Government continue to reserve their right to withdraw their support for the restructuring. Therefore, contingency plans remain in place to secure our objectives if the restructuring plan fails for any reason and British Energy decides administration is the only option.

Women and Work Commission

The Minister for Women and Equality (Ms Patricia Hewitt): I am pleased to inform the House that on 27 September 2004 I announced the launch of the Women and Work Commission, an ad hoc advisory group comprising members drawn from both sides of the social partnership, plus experts in their respective fields. It has been set up to make recommendations to the Government on tackling the pay gap between men and women. The gender pay gap has narrowed considerably from around 30 per cent. when the Equal Pay Act came into effect in 1975, and more women than ever before—13 million—are in employment. But persistent differences in men and women's experience of the labour market remain. The gender pay gap currently stands at 18 per cent. for full-time workers and 40 per cent. for part-time workers. In a full employment economy it is imperative that we harness the skills and talents of every potential worker. The Women and Work Commission will bring forward recommendations to the Prime Minister within 12 months to build on this Government's proud record of action in this area.

The Women and Work Commission will look at:

how men's and women's education and skills affect which jobs they can get;

promotion and career progression—the 'glass ceiling';

women's experiences in the job market before and after having children; and the different experiences of women working full-time and part-time.

The Women and Work Commission's Terms of Reference are as follows.

Women now make up 45 per cent. of the workforce, up from 38 per cent. in 1971. The Equal Pay Act and the Sex Discrimination Act in the 1970s were important milestones in breaking down the barriers to women's participation in the labour market. But wages are low in many occupations dominated by women and there is still a gap in mean hourly earnings between men and women: it is 18 per cent. among full-time workers and 40 per cent. for those women working part-time.

There are a number of factors influencing the gender pay gap. The DTI's review of maternity, paternity and flexible working legislation takes account of how caring responsibilities impact upon men and women's labour market attachment and their earnings. The Women and Work Commission will examine the other key factors shaping the difference in hourly earnings between men and women, including labour market experience, skills and education and discrimination. In investigating the impact of discrimination, the Commission will look at the measures necessary to strengthen equal pay legislation, including the case for equal pay reviews to be mandatory.

Making progress on the gender pay gap is a key priority because in a full employment economy we have to draw on the skills and talents of all potential workers, men and women, and remove obstacles to women's greater participation in the labour market. But it is also important because women have the right to expect a fair deal in the labour market.

The aim of the Women and Work Commission will be to look at these wide-ranging influences on the gender pay gap:

How men and women's educational experience and skills acquisition foreshadows occupational segregation.

General factors shaping women and men's labour market experience, including entry into employment, occupational segregation, full-time and part-time work experience, progression in the workplace and the tax and benefit system, as well as discrimination.

Women's experience in the labour market before and after having children As a substantial employer of women, the public sector warrants particular examination.

The Commission will make recommendations to the Prime Minister within 12 months from autumn 2004, taking account of the importance of promoting employability, the wider benefits to the economy and the impact on employers and public expenditure. The Commission will take account of the DTI review of maternity, paternity and flexible working legislation in shaping its recommendations.

I am pleased to welcome, alongside Margaret Prosser, Chair of the Women and Work Commission, the following members:

Chair: Baroness Prosser of Battersea

Members:

Sarah Anderson (Chief Executive, the Mayday Group),

Chris Banks (Chair of National Learning and Skills Council),

Kay Carberry (Assistant General Secretary, TUC),

Naaz Coker (Chair, Refugee Council & Chair, St George's Healthcare NHS Trust),

Debbie Coulter (Deputy General Secretary, GMB),

John Cridland (Deputy Director-General, Confederation of British Industry),

John Hannett (General Secretary, USD AW),

Sally Hopson (Retail and Managing Director (North Division), Asda),

Adeeba Malik (Deputy Chief Executive of Quest for Economic Development),

Stella Manzie (Chief Executive, Coventry City Council),

Julie Mellor (Chair, Equal Opportunities Commission),

Christine Ray (Group HR Director, The Rank Group),

Ruth Silver (Principal, Lewisham College),

Liz Snape (Head of Policy Development, Unison).

A call for evidence will be made later in the autumn. Any queries on the Women and Work Commission should be directed to Matilda Quincy, Secretary to the Women and Work Commission, Women and Equality Unit, DTI.

DEFENCE

Missile Defence

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The Ministry of Defence has signed an agreement setting out mechanisms for co-operation with the US in research, development, test and evaluation activities related to missile defence. This agreement is made under the framework memorandum of understanding on missile defence that I announced to the House on 12 June 2003, Official Report, column 57WS, and comes into immediate effect. I am placing in the Library of the House of Commons a copy of this agreement, although parts of the text relating to the handling of classified and export-controlled information have been withheld at the request of the US. This agreement replaces the 1985 strategic defence initiative memorandum of understanding as the vehicle for co-operation between the UK and US in the field of missile defence. It is intended that the new agreement will improve co-operation by providing information transfer and contracting mechanisms in keeping with current US and UK practices and the current state of development of the US missile defence capability.

Warship Support Agency

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): Key targets have been set for the chief executive of the WSA for financial year 2004–05 as follows:

Title	Details	Target
KT 1a—Provision of available force element days	The measurement of the number of days when the material condition of a vessel enables it to perform its scheduled task on that day.	To provide Commander-In-Chief Fleet (CINCFLEET) with the target level of available force element days agreed in the CINCFLEET/Defence logistics organisation (DLO) customer supplier agreement (CSA).
KT 1b—Provision of ready force element days	The measurement of the number of days when the material state of a vessel enables it to meet its required readiness category.	To provide CINCFLEET with the target level of the ready force element days agreed in the CINCFLEET/DLO customer supplier agreement (CSA).
KT 2—Timely completion of upkeep periods.	The measurement of the amount by which the upkeep periods overrun.	To meet the planned delivery dates for vessels undergoing deep maintenance and repair within the agreed upkeep factor tolerance.
KT 3—Timely completion of the high priority capability improvement programme	The measurement of the number of high priority upgrades implemented in accordance with the agreed and published installation plan.	To fit 87 per cent. of the high priority, type A capability improvements (alterations and Additions—A and A) selected by the equipment capability customer (ECC).
KT 4—Provision of single living accommodation	The measurement of the increase in available single living accommodation (SLA).	To provide CINCFLEET, 2SL/CNH and naval base lodger units with the required quantity and quality of single living accommodation for their entitled personnel as articulated in DLO CSA.
KT 5—Provision of operational support services at the naval bases.	The measurement of the delivery of operational support services to a satisfactory standard.	To provide CINCFLEET with the operational support services articulated in DLO customer supplier agreements (CSA) at the agreed ISO 9000 quality management standard.
KT 6—Maintenance of WSA capacity to support the naval force generation plan	The assurance that the agency has the capacity to contribute to the naval force generation plan.	To achieve a satisfactory assessment against all elements of the agency's contribution to the naval force generation plan.
KT 7—Delivering planned efficiencies	The measurement of the delivery of planned efficiencies.	To ensure delivery of 90 per cent. of the planned efficiency savings in the DLO benefits tracking tool that are scheduled to be achieved this financial year.

Support Vehicle

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): Following extensive work to identify the best way forward, the Ministry of Defence will appoint MAN ERF UK Ltd. as the preferred bidder for the support vehicle contract.

The support vehicle project is a tri-service procurement to replace the current cargo and recovery vehicle fleets. The new vehicles will bring the UK's armed forces a much-improved capability for transporting vital supplies to the front line while on deployed and expeditionary operations, together with a much enhanced recovery capability to deal with a greater range of damaged or immobilised vehicles.

Bids from MAN ERF UK Ltd., Mercedes-Benz UK Defence, the Oshkosh Truck Corporation and Stewart & Stevenson TVS UK Ltd. were considered. Following detailed consideration of the proposals, MAN ERF UK Ltd. have been selected as the preferred bidder for the demonstration and manufacturing phase. The MAN ERF UK Ltd. bid offered the most compliant proposal, demonstrated the best value for money and is consistent with the UK's defence industrial policy. The project team will undertake detailed contractual negotiations prior to letting a contract. The intention is to bring the new vehicles into service as soon as possible with deliveries commencing in 2007.

This will give our forces one of the most advanced support vehicle fleets in the world, whilst ensuring the British taxpayer gets the best possible value for money.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Bellwin Scheme (North Cornwall)

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): North Cornwall district council experienced exceptional flooding and consequential damage on 16 August 2004. Given these circumstances I am satisfied that financial assistance under the Bellwin scheme is justified. A scheme will therefore be established under section 155 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989. Grant will be paid to the authority to cover 85 per cent. of the eligible costs above a threshold, which it has incurred in dealing with the flooding.

Council Tax Revaluation

The Minister for Local and Regional Government (Mr. Nick Raynsford): The Local Government Act 2003 requires the council tax revaluation in England to take effect on 1 April 2007. As part of the preparatory work, the Government has considered what property information should be published as part of the new council tax lists to help taxpayers take a view on whether the basis of their council tax band is correct.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is today publishing a consultation paper seeking views on whether the council tax list should contain information about individual properties, whether the list should be published in draft by the Valuation Office Agency (as well as local authorities) and whether the Valuation Office Agency should issue a notice to each council tax payer showing the sales evidence on which the banding has been based.

Copies of the consultation paper have been made available in the Libraries of the House and are also available on the ODPM website www.odpm.gov.uk.

The consultation period ends on 4 January 2005.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Private Sewers

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): I have today put forward for consideration findings from the consultation on existing private sewers in England and Wales. The Government paper summarises responses to that consultation and sets out the shared views of central government and the Welsh Assembly Government. I have placed a copy in the House Library.

Many householders are often unaware that their property is connected to a private sewer or that they are responsible for its maintenance and repair, sometimes jointly with others, until a problem occurs.

The problems associated with private sewers and drains include:

> difficulties of establishing the ownership of and responsibilities for maintaining shared private sewers;
> the unwillingness of some owners or occupiers to accept their responsibilities and the difficulty of requiring them to contribute towards the cost of repair to shared private sewers;
> the owners and occupiers are unable to afford the high costs of repair to private sewers and drains;
> the difficulty of getting private sewers adopted by the sewerage undertaker;
> sewage flooding from private sewers.

The Government have already taken action to tackle these problems. This has been done in two stages: the first stage, now in place, prevents the proliferation of the problems by introducing a protocol for the construction of new sewers. This requires all sewers to be built to a standard that would not preclude their adoption by the sewerage undertaker. New legislation will allow sewerage undertakers to adopt laterals, that part of the drain situated outside a property boundary and running from the boundary to the sewer, if they are built to an adoptable standard.

The second stage looked at existing private sewers. A consultation paper entitled "Review of Existing Private Sewers in England and Wales" was published on 1 July 2003 and sought views on a number of possible solutions, including the adoption of private sewers by sewerage undertakers.

Respondents to the consultation included local authorities, sewerage undertakers, Ofwat, WaterVoice, and a number of other groups and individuals. We have studied all responses carefully, and I am grateful for the efforts respondents have made.

Ninety-five per cent. of respondents stated that current arrangements are unsatisfactory and that changes are needed to address the problems associated with private sewers. I therefore believe that there is a clear case for action to be taken to resolve the problems created by private sewers.

Respondents supported a number of general legislative changes and the introduction of guidance. However, it was acknowledged that these measures alone may only provide partial solutions to the problems caused by private sewers.

Eighty one per cent. of respondents—including 81 per cent. of responding local authorities, and seven out of ten sewerage undertakers—favour a change of ownership. A transfer of ownership to sewerage undertakers may provide a comprehensive solution to the problem of private sewers. However, this option would result in far-reaching changes and I consider that further work needs to be done before any decisions are taken on this matter.

Before a decision can be made, a number of issues and practicalities need to be resolved, including the scope of any transfer, the form it might take, the costs, funding, impact on the private drain and sewer repair business, impact on the insurance industry and customer reaction.

This is an important issue that impacts on many householders and I am keen to find an effective solution. My Department chairs a steering group that will continue to consider the issues set out in this paper, in consultation with stakeholders as necessary, with a view to informing a final decision.

As part of the consultation process I propose to invite interested stakeholders to a seminar. This will provide an opportunity to further discuss the issues raised in this paper.

I hope to be able to publish a decision paper early in the new year.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Middle East Peace Process: Settlements

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): Phase 1 of the Quartet's road map is clear that settlement activity including natural growth should be frozen and that all outposts set up since March 2001 should be dismantled. This has not happened. Continued Israeli settlement building has undoubtedly contributed to the current stalemate in the peace process. Continued settlement building cannot be defended on security grounds. It undermines trust in the region and is illegal under international law. Examples of UK activity on the issue of settlements are:

> We lobby the Israeli government at all levels to discuss their continued failure to fulfil their road map objectives concerning settlement activity.
> Officials in our embassy in Tel Aviv and our consulate general in Jerusalem monitor Israeli settlement activity on the ground through visits to settlements and work with Israeli, Palestinian and international NGOs, the World Bank and UN specialised agencies to track settlement activity. This includes regular contact with the Palestinian Negotiations Affairs Department.
> Analysis is made of the impact of continued settlement activity directly on the Palestinian population and the prospects for the establishment of a territorially contiguous Palestinian state.
> Her Majesty's Government has spent £110,000 in financial year 2003–04 on funding a project monitoring settlement activity and is sharing this information with our international partners.
> We have also sponsored a number of studies on Israeli government financial support to settlers, including one conducted by a well-known Israeli NGO in 2003. We share data from these projects and our own monitoring with our international partners for use in their discussions on settlement expansion with the Israeli Government.

Her Majesty's Government will continue this important work while maintaining equal commitment to encourage the Palestinian Authority to make real progress on their road map commitments.

Iraq

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): The report on the review of intelligence on weapons of mass destruction chaired by Lord Butler of Brockwell, published on 14 July 2004 (HC 898), highlighted in chapter 5.9 the importance of effective scrutiny and validation of human intelligence sources, and concluded that validation of sources after the war had thrown doubt on a high proportion of the sources and their reports. Specifically, the review concluded that the validity of the line of reporting which included the 45 minutes intelligence had come into question; it further concluded that reporting received from a liaison service on Iraqi production of biological agent was seriously flawed.

The Chief of SIS has now written to the Intelligence and Security Committee (ISC) to inform the Committee that, as a result of further investigation by SIS, both these lines of intelligence reporting have been formally withdrawn. This is normal practice in such cases.

HEALTH

Mental Health Act Commission

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton):

The annual accounts and accompanying comptroller and auditor general report of the Mental Health Act Commission for 2003–04 has today been laid before the House of Commons pursuant to section 98(1C) of the National Health Service Act 1977. Copies have been placed in the Library.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Hurricanes Ivan and Jeanne

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): On 16 September 2004, I provided the House with a written statement of the United Kingdom's response to the impact of hurricane Ivan on the Caribbean. I would like to update the House on subsequent developments, including the impact of hurricane Jeanne. May I once more express all our sincere condolences to the families of those who have lost their lives, and to all those who have suffered injury and continue to suffer in the aftermath of these devastating hurricanes.

The British Government's immediate response to the relief needs of those affected by the two hurricanes have been some £3.4 million of assistance. In addition the Royal Navy frigate HMS Richmond and its auxiliary vessel RFA Wave Ruler have also provided support.

On Grenada, hurricane Ivan caused 37 deaths and affected most of the 102,000 population to some extent. Of the six parishes, St. Andrew, St. David, St. Georges and St. John were the worst effected. Approximately 30 per cent. of houses were destroyed and a further 60 per cent. damaged. According to the Red Cross some 50 per cent. of the population is currently homeless. Government buildings, the main prison, hospitals, schools and churches have all been affected. The official residences of both the Governor-General and the Prime Minister were destroyed. Utility services were severely disrupted and the agricultural sector has been decimated. The continuing needs include emergency shelter, food, health, seeds and tools.

Following our initial and immediate support to the relief effort, reported in the earlier statements to the House, we have contributed £500,000 to the regional appeal of the International Federation of the Red Cross, of which £300,000 is for Grenada. The appeal will support 10,000 families on Grenada for the next six months with emergency food, shelter, water and sanitation and various non-food items. Following a request from the Prime Minister of Grenada, the United Kingdom's regional prisons adviser visited the island from 1–6 October to make an assessment of damage to the prison and to draw up recommendations. We have provided £30,000 for urgent repair work to the prison. Remedial repair work has already begun. We also reinforced our office in Grenada, sending four officials from Bridgetown and two from London, who among other tasks provided assistance to British citizens who wanted to leave Grenada to do so. The United Nations has launched a flash appeal for Grenada to respond over the next six months to urgent humanitarian need and to help establish the foundation for the rehabilitation of social services and economic recovery. The appeal is for £14.9 million. We are consulting United Nations agencies on how we might best support their appeal. In addition, we are providing £200,000 to Christian Aid and £200,000 to Oxfam to support their relief programmes.

The European Community has announced it is mobilising £4.65 million in emergency relief and post emergency rehabilitation to help Grenada focus on the provision of emergency shelter, food, water and other key supplies for 5,000 homeless families. It includes funds to be mobilized under the 9th European Development Fund, which are expected to be used primarily for school rehabilitation. The United Kingdom's share of this European Community assistance is about £700,000.

The Department for International Development has been re-examining how its ongoing programmes in Grenada might be modified. We have already extended the contract of our public sector modernisation consultant to work with the Prime Minister's Office and assist with the design of a new government structure, including an agency for reconstruction and development, and an implementation plan; started a technical assessment of the key constraints and immediate priorities for the private sector; and re-directed funds under our micro finance programme.

The Department for International Development will also seek to ensure that there is a co-ordinated and effective response to the present crisis. We called and chaired a donor co-ordination meeting on support to the education sector in Grenada to start discussions about how donors should align their support in this sector, which has been identified as a key priority by Prime Minister Mitchell.

Last week's donor meeting on Grenada convened by the World Bank in Washington provided a useful opportunity for Prime Minister Mitchell and his Minister of Finance to outline the traumatic social and physical cost that hurricane Ivan had inflicted upon his country. It was also an opportunity for key agencies—such as the United Nations—to highlight how the region and the donor community had responded thus far to the immediate humanitarian challenge. The Economic Council for Latin America and the Caribbean presented a report where they estimated that the total public and private cost of rehabilitation will be around £485 million. The International Monetary Fund presented a paper where they had calculated that there was a budget financing gap of around £21 million that needed to be filled between now and the end of this year. A follow-up donor meeting is planned for six weeks' time in Grenada.

The Foreign Secretary sent a personal envoy, Baroness Howells, to Grenada to express the condolences and sympathy of the British Government and people to the Grenadian Government and population and to assess the situation. She visited the island on 23–24 September. The British High Commissioner from Barbados and Department for International Development officials accompanied her. The Foreign Secretary and I are meeting her shortly to discuss her findings and assess the UK's response.

On Jamaica, 17 people were killed by hurricane Ivan. Although the Government of Jamaica were well prepared, there was still extensive damage over a wide geographical area and it appealed for international assistance. Rapid joint assessments were conducted from 14–16 September by a United Nations Disaster Assessment and Co-ordination Team, supported by United Nations agencies, the International Federation of the Red Cross Field Assessment and Co-ordination Team, the Jamaican Red Cross, non-governmental organisations and representatives from the Office of Disaster Preparedness and Emergency.

The worst affected parish was Clarendon. Other parishes severely affected included St. Catherine, Manchester, St. Elizabeth, Westmorland, Portland and St. Thomas, as well as Kingston itself. Some limited damage was reported in St. Ann, St. James and Trelawny. Most of the damage resulted directly from the strong winds. In Westmorland there was also significant flooding and in Portland and St. James landslides constrained immediate access. Around 25,000 people were affected significantly, with a higher number affected by loss of electrical power and interrupted water supply. Up to 13,000 were accommodated in shelters. More than 3,000 families received immediate relief assistance. The Jamaican Defence Forces participated in early relief efforts by airlifting food to isolated communities. The Pan American Health Organisation has been working closely with the Ministry of Health assisting with the supply of potable water to hospitals.

Some £150,000 of our contribution to the appeal of the International Federation of the Red Cross will benefit Jamaica. The appeal aims to provide support to 3,000 affected families. We have also provided £157,000 to Save the Children for the provision of non-food relief and repairs to households and schools, £200,000 to Oxfam for their relief and rehabilitation programme and £115,000 to the Pan American Health Organisation for their support to health services. The European Commission has pledged £830,000 to Jamaica through its Humanitarian Aid Office, focusing on reducing the number of persons in temporary shelters and providing alternative accommodation for those currently housed in schools. The United Kingdom's share of this support is about £153,000.

Hurricane Ivan caused widespread devastation across the island of Grand Cayman resulting in a breakdown of communications, power and water, as well as severe damage to individual properties and commercial buildings. Approximately 3,000 residents took refuge in eight government shelters. There was one confirmed death and one person missing at sea presumed dead. The islands of Cayman Brac and Little Cayman were affected by tropical storm force winds and rain but essential services were soon operational on these two islands.

The Royal Navy frigate HMS Richmond and its auxiliary vessel followed in the wake of the hurricane. It stood off Grand Cayman until it was safe for the crew to go ashore. They helped with a number of civilian clean up tasks.

The relief effort on Grand Cayman was managed through the Office of the National Hurricane Committee, supported by the British Red Cross Society—Cayman Branch. The assessments report damage to 75 per cent. of houses and between 20 and 25 per cent. destroyed, the worst damage to low cost housing areas. Five shelters remain open accommodating and feeding around 900. Schools, hospitals and government buildings suffered damage to varying degrees.

The Department for International Development sent a two person assessment team to Grand Cayman on 13 September. They reported that the airport and hospital were functioning, and food and water had been distributed to the 3,000 residents living in shelters. The Government authorities have also established systems to deliver food and water to people who were residing in their homes or with host families. In consultation with the Governor and the National Hurricane Committee, the Department for International Development team returned to Jamaica on 15 September, from where they maintained close contact with the National Hurricane Committee.

There was no immediate shortage of fuel on Grand Cayman, but there was a temporary problem with access to power to operate the three main gas stations of the island. However, distribution of fuel proved the main problem in the immediate aftermath. Power was gradually restored by the Caribbean Utilities Company who brought in additional teams. Fuel vouchers were distributed to staff working in essential services. The main desalination plant on Grand Cayman was working by 17 September and water supplied to George Town. A second smaller desalination plant was also quickly re-operational. Stocks of bottled water on Grand Cayman were gradually being depleted and although the water distribution network was being repaired it was necessary to bring in additional supplies. As a contingency measure we responded to a request to provide an urgent airlift of water.

Although there were early reports of sporadic looting, this was opportunistic rather than organised, and limited, and was soon under control. Police reinforcements brought in from other overseas territories in the region supported by the British Government. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office Overseas Territories Law Enforcement Adviser also arrived on the island to provide expert advice.

In response to the hurricane, the Department for International Development airlifted 5,000 plastic sheets, 40 metric tonnes of bottled water and a further consignment of chainsaws, adult and baby cots, water purification tablets and public health and sanitation items, including industrial and household waste disposal bags, and industrial gloves. The value of this relief response is about £200,000. An airlift of additional relief items from the International Federation of the Red Cross's Pan American Disaster Response Unit were received on 17and 23 September. The British Government have also pledged around £100,000 towards the cost of deploying a contingent from the Bermuda Regiment, which is providing support to the clear up operations.

The Government of the Cayman Islands quickly initiated a process of identifying contractors, electricians, plumbers, building and insurance inspectors in preparation for the rehabilitation and reconstruction task. A Cayman Islands Recovery Committee was formed, which includes high-level representation from Government and the private sector. Disease and surveillance systems were established to address all health conditions. To prevent tetanus infections, boosters were offered and 13,000 doses given. Supermarkets quickly reopened. The water authority has restored running water to much of Grand Cayman, although in some areas supplies are restricted to certain times. Mains supplies, however, are yet to be restored to eastern districts. Mains electricity supply has been restored to most of the capital but is still to be restored to the remainder of Grand Cayman. Many homes are being powered by generators. The Cayman Islands Government are liaising with the insurance sector to ensure payments are released quickly, so the reconstruction of homes can begin in earnest. A national recovery fund has been established.

Hurricane Ivan crossed over Cuba as a category 5 hurricane on 13 September. It took nearly five hours for the hurricane to pass over the northern tip of the island with sustained winds reaching 160 miles per hour. The Cuban authorities undertook appropriate measures in advance of the arrival of the hurricane and the Cuban Red Cross kept the population informed through a series of television and radio announcements. Over 1.5 million people were evacuated and 300,000 people accommodated in shelters. There was some damage to the agricultural and housing sector but no deaths reported. The regional appeal of the International Federation of the Red Cross supports the provision of shelter and non-food relief for 3,000 families in Cuba, The Department for International Development's contribution to the Red Cross regional appeal includes provision for support to the needs in Cuba.

Tropical storm Jeanne passed through Puerto Rico and the United States Virgin Islands on 15 September killing two people. It made landfall on the Dominican Republic as a category 1 hurricane and moved slowly north-west on 16 and 17 September, losing strength but causing extensive damage and killing 11. It reached Haiti on 17 September, with heavy rain falling over deforested hills in the north. Flooding started slowly on 18 September and then increased quickly to flash flooding causing fast run-off into the valleys and towns.

The death toll in Haiti currently stands at 1,870 with 884 people missing and 2,620 injured. Around 300,000 have been affected, with 4,471 houses destroyed. The city of Gonaives was the most seriously affected. Other towns in the peninsula, between Gonaives and Port de Paix, were also affected including Ennery, Gros Morne, Ans Rouge and Port de Paix. As a result of the flooding a big lake formed on the approach to Gonaives and submerged the surrounding roads, limiting access into the city from Port au Prince. However, Gonaives was still accessible from the south by trucks, with careful navigation. The route from Gonaives to Cap Haitien and Port de Paix was temporarily closed due to flooding and landslides.

The Interim Prime Minister Gerard Latortue called for international assistance and formed a National Emergency Committee to oversee the relief effort. The United Nations Office for the Co-ordination of Humanitarian Affairs deployed a seven-person assessment and co-ordination team to assist them.

The Haitian Ministry of Health sent four doctors and ten health officers to Gonaives. The United Nations Stabilization Mission in Haiti flew helicopters into Gonaives, carrying food and medicine. The World Food Programme has been trucking food into Gonaives. The International Federation of the Red Cross responded by making available hygiene kits, family tents, plastic sheeting and body bags from stores in Port au Prince. The Pan American Disaster Response Unit airlifted further quantities of hygiene kits, kitchen sets and plastic sheeting. The World Health Organisation delivered 10,000 basic health kits and the Red Cross and non-governmental organisations rehabilitated the operating theatre of the main hospital in Gonaives and set up an emergency field hospital and health clinics. The United Nations Stabilisation Mission provided doctors to Gonaives. Medical supplies were initially sufficient due to pre-existing Pan American Health Organisation stocks. As an interim measure additional water provision was met through bladders and water purification plants. Sufficient amounts of potable water are now available.

Following discussion with the United Nations and humanitarian agencies, the Department for International Development organised two airlifts carrying 718 family tents to provide shelter for over 3,500 people in Gonaives. Some humanitarian agencies were experiencing logistical difficulties, so the airlifts also included two landrover pick-up vehicles, four portable generators and radio communications equipment to support an expansion of their operations. The Department for International Development also deployed a humanitarian adviser to Haiti to assess the situation and consult with partner agencies. We have since invited funding proposals from non-governmental organisations and are considering support to their relief programmes. The United Nations launched a flash appeal, in New York, on 1 October. We are consulting with United Nations agencies on possible support through the appeal. The Department for International Development have provided £625,000, in support to the relief effort in Haiti. This consists of £150,00 to the International Federation of the Red Cross towards the relief operations and £475,000 to CARE towards logistics and for the distribution of 718 family tents procured by us. The European Community has announced a contribution of £1 million towards emergency relief in Haiti. The United Kingdom share of this humanitarian assistance is approximately £200,000.

Tropical storm Jeanne then continued a path across the Caribbean and was upgraded to a category 3 hurricane as it passed over the north-western Bahamas on 25 September. Several areas had been evacuated from its path and many people moved into shelters. Hurricane Jeanne struck Abaco, Andros, Berry, Bimini, Eleuthera, Exuma, Grand Bahama and New Providence islands. The most significant damage in the Bahamas was caused to the islands of Grand Bahama and Abaco. However, no deaths or serious injuries were reported, with approximately 100 homes reportedly damaged. The Bahamas Red Cross undertook an initial assessment that indicated up to 5,000 families in the hardest hit areas were in need of assistance. The International Federation of the Red Cross provided support to the Bahamas Red Cross, having utilised funds from their Disasters and Emergency Relief Fund, to which the Department for International Development makes an annual contribution. The most urgent needs have been met.

One month on from the devastation caused by hurricane Ivan across the Caribbean, the first phase of emergency response is well underway. Mid to longer-term reconstruction is expected to continue for many months. Coverage of beneficiaries is improving rapidly with affected communities having received at least one distribution of food, and various combinations of other types of non-food and shelter assistance. Reconstruction and repair of houses, schools and essential public buildings will continue to take time to address. The relief effort is working well together. All major donors have now sent missions to the affected countries to assess how they should re-shape their ongoing programmes of support, a co-ordinated response to support the plans of national government will be key to taking forward the reconstruction effort. I have already contacted the IMF, the World Bank, the Caribbean Development Bank and the Inter-American Development Bank to urge them to offer support as quickly as possible.

This has been an extremely difficult period for the Caribbean. The British Government have contributed quickly and appropriately to the immediate needs in the region and our support to the relief effort is continuing. I would like to place on record my thanks to the DFID staff, and to other colleagues across Government and in the Royal Navy for their sterling efforts. Other countries, including within the Caribbean region, have also made important and valued contributions to bring help to those in need. We will now be working hard, with other donors and the multilateral institutions, to maintain the relief effort and help bring the necessary support for the longer-term recovery of the affected islands.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Oversight Commissioner's Report

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Ian Pearson): I am pleased to announce that the oversight commissioner's second statutory report for the year 2004 was published on 21 September, in accordance with section 68(4)(a) of the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000. Copies are available in the Library.

This is the second report compiled by Al Hutchinson as oversight commissioner and the eleventh in the series of oversight reports published since 2001.

Fisheries Conservancy Board

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Angela Smith): Copies of the annual report and accounts for the Fisheries Conservancy Board for Northern Ireland for the year ended 31 December 2003 have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

This document provides details of the board's fisheries conservation and protection activities, its performance, and its income and expenditure for that year.

PRIME MINISTER

Appointment of Surveillance Commissioner

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): I am pleased to announce that I have approved the appointment of the right hon. Sir Liam McCollum as a surveillance commissioner under the terms of section 91 of the Police Act 1997.

Sir Liam McCollum succeeded Sir John McDermott on the expiry of his appointment as a surveillance commissioner on 30 September 2004.

OSCE Delegation Replacement

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): I am pleased to announce that my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester Central (Tony Lloyd) has been appointed as a member of the United Kingdom delegation to the parliamentary assembly of the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Customs and Excise and Inland Revenue Prosecutions

The Solicitor-General (Harriet Harman): My right hon. Friend the Attorney-General has made the following Ministerial Statement:

> "On 4 December 2003, Official Report (Lords), columns WA32–33, I announced that the Government had decided to accept the recommendation of the review conducted by Mr Justice Butterfield, that the Customs and Excise Prosecutions Office should become a fully independent prosecuting authority, accountable to me.
> Subsequent to that announcement the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced on 17 March 2004, in his Budget Statement, that the Government was accepting the recommendations of the 'Review of the Revenue Departments' led by the Permanent Secretary to the Treasury, Gus O'Donnell. One of the key recommendations of that review was to integrate the Revenue and Customs into a single department.
> I can now announce that the Government has decided to create a single prosecuting authority to deal with revenue and customs prosecutions work, in line with the creation of Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs. The new prosecuting authority, which will be known as the Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office (RCPO) will be an entirely separate prosecuting authority, accountable to me, and responsible for the prosecution of all HM Revenue and Customs cases in England and Wales. This is an important step which will ensure that we have an effective and fully independent prosecuting authority dealing with many of the most important cases in the criminal justice system. Work to create a fully independent prosecuting authority is underway; and the legislation required to complete the establishment of the new office will be brought forward as soon as parliamentary time permits".

WORK AND PENSIONS

Pensions Commission Report

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Alan Johnson): I welcome the Pensions Commission's interim report that was published today. I would like to thank Adair Turner and his fellow-commissioners for their thorough work on this important issue. Building on the analysis in our 2002 Green Paper, this report makes clear the scale of the challenge posed by increasing life expectancy. It is good news that people are living longer. But it means difficult decisions for all of us—individuals, employers. Government and society as a whole—about how we balance work, saving and retirement.

In this initial baseline report, the commission has made a number of recommendations about how the Government collect and analyse statistical information. I welcome and accept these.

The report stresses that while some major advances in pensions have been made in the last few years, pressures on private pensions have been building up since the early 1980s. It further stresses that the biggest implications are some 20 to 25 years off, rather than being imminent. This is a problem for society over the longer term that requires us to begin to map out solutions now. As the commission says, we need "well-founded policy recommendations" rather than "immediate conclusions".

The report recognises the logic and many successes of recent pension policy. Our first priority was to tackle the legacy of pensioner poverty. In 1997 some 2.7 million pensioners were below the absolute poverty line, and many were expected to live on as little as £69 a week. Principally through record increases in support to poorer pensioners, absolute poverty was reduced by two-thirds by 2002–03; this progress is continuing through the pension credit introduced last year.

The next step was to help those on lower incomes build a second pension and ensure that it paid to do so. For the last year, the pension credit has been getting extra cash to those with modest second pensions, and the state second pension plays a crucial role in helping many people build a proper second pension for the first time, including 5 million carers and disabled people, as well as 15 million lower-paid workers.

The report recognises the importance of strengthening private pensions. The Pensions Bill and other forthcoming measures—outlined in the report—will restore public confidence in pension saving, while making it easier for firms to run good schemes. Reforms will also strengthen voluntary saving with attractive new options to save, a much simpler tax regime and initiatives to inform and activate people to help them take advantage of what is already on offer.

The report emphasises that a crucial part of the response to longer lives is likely to be more people choosing to work for longer. It shows that over the last decade employment rates for older workers have increased very significantly. This welcome trend needs to continue, and measures in the pipeline, such as the outlawing of age discrimination in October 2006, will be crucial. Under measures in the Finance Bill, for the first time people will be able to continue to work while drawing an occupational pension from the same employer. Proposals in the Pensions Bill will allow people who put off claiming their state pension to have a new choice—either to build up a higher weekly pension as now, or earn a taxable lump sum. For example, someone who delayed claiming £80.00 for five years could get either a weekly pension of £120 a week or a lump sum of around £25,000 before tax.

It is also clear to me that we need to keep in view both sides of the pensions equation—state and private. Our reform of the state system first improved its effectiveness in tackling poverty. The next step was helping lower-earners build up decent second pensions and ensuring that saving does not go unrewarded. As we go forward, we need to design a pension system that has the basic state pension at its core, continues to give special help to the poorest and provides incentives to save for hard-working families whatever their income.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

BBC (Digital Television)

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): I have today placed the independent review of the BBC's digital television services by Professor Patrick Barwise in the Libraries of both Houses. The report is also available electronically on the Department's website www.culture.gov.uk, together with a copy of the supporting report from Ofcom "Assessment of the Market Impact of the BBC's New Digital TV and Radio Services".

In response to this review, I have asked the BBC to give me its initial response to the report by the end of November. I will then consider whether further action is needed in the context of Charter Review.

I will publish the independent review of the BBC's digital radio services shortly.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Firefighters' Pensions (Consultation)

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): I have today published two consultation papers on the future pension arrangements for firefighters as the first stage in meeting our commitment to introduce a new pension scheme more suited to the service of the future made in the White Paper "Our Fire and Rescue Service".

The first "Government proposals for a new firefighters' pension scheme" sets out a framework for firefighters recruited to the fire and rescue service from April 2006; the second "proposals for amendments to the firefighters' pension scheme" outlines some further changes that we believe need to be made to the existing scheme, which will continue to operate for those who are already members or join before April 2006.

Copies of the documents have been sent to fire and rescue service stakeholders, and in the case of the second paper to all serving firefighters, with an invitation to comment. The period for consultation continues until 14 January 2005.

Copies of the two documents have been made available in the Libraries of both Houses.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Security (Palace of Westminster)

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): The House will be aware of the review by the Security Service and Metropolitan Police of the security of the Palace of Westminster. This report is, of course, a matter for Mr. Speaker, for the Lord Chairman and for the House authorities. However, it may be helpful if I update the House on the steps we have been taking to enhance the external security of Parliament and the surrounding area.

The Government have always set out clearly the nature of the threats that we face and the importance of keeping all our security measures and contingency planning under constant review. Therefore, alongside this formal review, I asked the Intelligence and Security Co-ordinator, Sir David Omand, earlier this year to gather a small team to provide advice on protective security measures outside the Houses of Parliament and more generally in the central Westminster area.

As the House would expect, the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police constantly reviews policing activities around the Whitehall and Westminster area. Operational police deployments have already been increased to counter the potential threat of vehicle bombs. In addition, I have already agreed further enhancements to the support for operational policing of the area including work on a new control room and CCTV.

We will also be discussing with Westminster City Council, the Mayor, Transport for London and other relevant authorities whether any further physical measures are required to provide additional protection around the Palace of Westminster. The Government recently tabled an amendment to the Civil Contingencies Bill, which will allow highway authorities to make an Anti-terrorist Traffic Regulation Order, on the application of the Chief Constable. As we indicated in laying the amendment, this is not specifically intended to control vehicle access around Parliament but it will make it easier for the police to respond to particular threats by further controlling traffic.

Whilst there are no plans for any major programme of road closures, I am determined that we should avoid a situation in which a series of steps, which may be sensible in themselves, has a wider impact on traffic and public access to this important part of London. I therefore believe that it would be helpful to undertake a wider process of consultation with the Mayor, Transport for London and other authorities and interested parties of the consequences of and options for changes to management of traffic around Parliament should further restrictions become necessary. I believe that this is essential if we are to safeguard and enhance not just the security of the area but also its economic and social well-being.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Sudan

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): The UK will commit at least £100 million next year for humanitarian and development assistance for Sudan provided there is early signature of a comprehensive peace agreement and the Government of Sudan live up to their commitments on Darfur. The £100 million for next year will enable us to maintain our significant response to support for the humanitarian crisis in Darfur. It will also enable the UK to contribute to other humanitarian, recovery and reintegration needs in Sudan. We look forward to the signing of a comprehensive peace agreement before the end of the year and to working with the new administrations in Sudan to establish a development programme that contributes to eradicating poverty and building a safer Sudan for all.

HOME DEPARTMENT

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): I have today laid before Parliament the twelfth annual report of the Firearms Consultative Committee, copies of which have been placed in the House Library.

The work of the Committee has already helped to inform the consultation paper we issued in May on future firearms controls and we will be considering their outstanding recommendations alongside other responses.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Disclosure of Court Papers

The Solicitor-General (Ms Harriet Harman): Further to my statement to the House on 24 March 2004, Official Report, columns 885–893, concerning the disclosure of court papers to the Minister for Children, Young People and Families and with the agreement of my hon. Friend the Baroness Ashton and my right hon. Friend the Minister for Children, Young People and Families I would like to make a further statement as to how the Government propose to change the law in relation to disclosures to and by members of Parliament of information relating to family court proceedings concerning children.

The Government have concluded that the legislation governing the rules on the disclosure of information relating to family court proceedings concerning children is too restrictive and requires amendment and clarification. The amendments designed to achieve this were tabled to the Children's Bill by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Children, Young People and Families on 7 October. They will, of course, be considered in proceedings on that Bill in the usual way.

In developing proposals for changes to the law relating to disclosure of information relating to family court proceedings concerning children, policy development has been based on a primary principle of the welfare of the child, supported by four further considerations, which are:

> providing for the sharing of information between those with a legitimate need for that information;
> the proper functioning of Parliament and the facilitation of the discharge of MPs' and Peers' functions;
> the legitimacy of the law, the match between the law and what actually happens; and > the proper administration of justice in family law cases.

The Government's main aim in considering amendments to the law are that the welfare of the child must be the paramount concern. We recognise that parties to family proceedings and others may have a legitimate interest, in limited circumstances, in sharing information. Our broad policy intention is to permit the disclosure of information relating to family proceedings where it is necessary to allow:

> parties to a case to obtain appropriate advice and support;
> MPs and Peers to undertake their official duties and Ministers to exercise their functions; statutory agencies, such as the police, the Crown Prosecution Service and Social Services, to obtain access to relevant information for child protection purposes; complaints to be made to supervisory bodies and investigations to be carried out; statutory bodies to undertake their regulatory and investigative functions; and approved research to be undertaken.

This list is not exhaustive. Further background is given in the written policy statement which has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses by my hon. Friend the Baroness Ashton and my right hon. Friend the Minister for Children, Young People and Families which explains the effect of the Government's amendments and sets out the Government's thinking on this issue and their proposed way ahead if the amendments tabled are agreed to by Parliament.

Briefly, the proposed amendments would do three things. First, they would amend section 97(2) of the Children Act 1989 to limit the criminal offence of publication of information which identifies or is likely to identify a child as being involved in family proceedings, or the address or school of such a child, to publications to the public or section of the public. Secondly, section 12(4) of the Administration of Justice Act 1960 would be clarified to make it clear that where rules of court specify that certain disclosures can be made, such disclosures would not be a contempt of court. Thirdly, a series of amendments would be made to current rule making powers to clarify that rules can be made specifying the circumstances in which disclosures may be made.

Hon. Members will recall that I undertook to consult the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve)—the shadow Attorney-General—on this matter. I have also consulted the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett), the Liberal Democrat spokesperson on legal affairs. I have also kept the Speaker and the Chairman of the Select Committee on Standards and Privileges informed.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Employers' Liability Compulsory Insurance

The Minister for Work (Jane Kennedy): In a written statement on 30 March 2004, Official Report, column 88WS, the then Minister of State for Work, my hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. Browne), announced the publication of a partial regulatory impact assessment (RIA) on a proposal to remove the requirement for ELCI from limited companies that employ only their owner (incorporated owners/sole employees). It is estimated that there are about 300,000 such companies.

The partial RIA sought the views of employers (in particular incorporated owners/sole traders), insurers and their representative bodies, and other stakeholders (e.g. employees, lawyers) and their representatives, on the proposal.

I am pleased to announce the publication on 6 October 2004 on the DWP website of the summary of responses to that consultation.

The majority of respondents to the partial RIA (over 78 per cent.) were in favour of the proposal to remove the requirement for employers' liability compulsory insurance (ELCI) from incorporated owners/sole employees. The majority of business associations, representing large numbers of businesses, were in favour of the change.

I have arranged for copies of the summary of responses to be placed in the Library.

Amending regulations will be introduced later this year and will come into force early in 2005.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

BBC Digital Radio Services

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): I have today placed the independent review of the BBC's digital radio services by Tim Gardam in the Libraries of both Houses. This is the sister document to the independent review of the BBC's digital television services by Professor Patrick Barwise, which I placed in the Libraries on 13 October. Ofcom's assessment of the market impact of the BBC's new digital TV and radio services, which supports both reviews, is available electronically on the Department's website www.culture.gov.uk.

In response to the review, I have asked the BBC to give me its initial response to the report by the end of November. I will then consider whether further action is needed in the context of charter review.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Supporting People Programme

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Keith Hill): We are publishing today the Government response to the ODPM: Housing, Planning, Local Government and the Regions Committee report on the supporting people programme. We welcome the Committee's report and its reference to the progress that the Government have made in implementing many of the independent review recommendations and the work undertaken to support the 2004 spending review.

This progress will help to bring stability to the supporting people programme, providing better opportunities for vulnerable people to live as independently as possible in their own home and community. Our work will continue to focus on ensuring that good quality, value for money housing related support services are delivered to vulnerable people, and that supporting people makes a positive difference to their quality of life.

TRANSPORT

Rail Franchising

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): "The Future of Rail" White Paper (Command Paper 6233), published in July, announced our intention to consider how rail passenger franchises could be best aligned with Network Rail's regional and route structure.

I am today announcing the first of a reduction in the current number of franchises to 19 in the first instance. This will be a managed process and changes will be introduced as soon as possible after the expiry of existing franchise contracts. Further streamlining will be necessary to further align franchises with Network Rail's operations to facilitate closer working between train and track. These changes would be done in a managed way.

The changes I am announcing today consist of the following:

> The formation of a new Greater Western franchise from the existing First Great Western, First Great Western Link (Thames) and Wessex Services, following expiry of current arrangements. The invitation to tender for these services will be issued in summer 2005.
> Merging the Greater Northern services (left over when West Anglia services of the original WAGN—West Anglia Great Northern—franchise were merged into one) with Thameslink. We aim to issue an invitation to tender for these services in Summer 2005.
> Following the expiry of the current central franchise in 2006, services will be distributed into the Silverlink, Chiltern, Virgin Cross Country, Midland mainline and Northern franchises. We will ensure that, where appropriate, these are put out to competitive tender as soon as possible. The exact nature and timing of these competitions is being finalised to ensure it reflects the needs of passengers and industry.
> A new franchise incorporating South West Trains and the Island Line, unless it is decided that the needs of the Island Line are not better served by a form of community management as set out in the White Paper.

Changing the franchise map is part of the commitment to improve the efficiency of our railways. These changes will help ensure:

> Franchises are aligned as far as possible with Network Rail regions and routes in order to encourage joint working between track and train to deliver an improved service to customers.
> Efficiency savings through economies of scale are maximised.

I am also able to announce today that, as stated in "The Future of Rail", Network Rail will be taking over responsibility for drawing up route utilisation strategies in order to make best use of the network's capacity.

Currently the Strategic Rail Authority manage this process. The SRA will publish the strategies for the Brighton main line, the east coast main line, the Great Western main line and for the west midlands over the next few months. For all future RUSs the responsibility will be moved to Network Rail.

These are important steps in implementing "The Future of Rail" White Paper. Ahead of the invitations to tender due to be issued in summer next year the following will have happened—the industry will have introduced integrated control centres for every route/franchise and will have reformed the network code to improve local decision-making. An RUS will have been completed for each of the tendered franchises.

These actions will help deliver a streamlined rail industry, that is fit to deliver the improvements the public expect.

I shall keep the House informed of further developments as we implement the proposals set out in the White Paper.

WORK AND PENSIONS

National Employment Action Plan

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): I have today placed in the Library copies of the UK's 2004 national action plan for employment.

The EU treaty requires member states to submit an annual report to the commission that sets out the principal measures being taking at a national level to implement employment policies in the context of the agreed EU employment guidelines. The national action plan responds to this requirement.

In preparing this plan, the Government have worked closely with representatives from local government and the voluntary sector, as well as the CBI and TUC. This has enabled us to include a broad range of examples showing how the objectives of creating more and better jobs and greater social cohesion are being pursued in the UK.

Written Ministerial Statements

Thursday 21 October 2004

TREASURY

Child Tax Credit

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): I said in a written answer on 11 March 2004, Official Report, column 1645W, that the timing of the phased transfer on to child tax credit (CTC) of the remaining families with children in receipt of income support/job seekers allowance, planned to begin from October, would be subject to a final review in the summer and that in the meantime, families would continue to receive the same level of support through their benefits as they would from CTC.

It is extremely important to safeguard continuity of support for children among this particularly vulnerable group. Following further consideration of the proposed timetable, I have decided that the transfer should be deferred and begin instead in the course of next year. This will allow a full cycle of tax credits activity to be completed before these families are transferred in.

Meanwhile, as I announced in March, I can again confirm that families will continue to receive the same level of financial support through their benefits as they would from CTC.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Valuation Appeals (Business Rates)

The Minister for Local and Regional Government (Mr. Nick Raynsford): As part of preparations for the next business rates revaluation which takes effect in April 2005, we have reviewed the current arrangements for handling valuation appeals. As a result we are proposing to make a number of changes.

In particular we propose to remove the present limitations whereby a successful appeal against a valuation only results in bills being recalculated from the start of the financial year in which the appeal is made. In the first year of the 2000 list, to encourage early applications, there was a further restriction in that bills were only recalculated back to the start of the year if appeals were made during the first six months. This will also be removed. As a result any reduction in value would now be backdated to the start of the period, i.e. April 2005, or for later additions or changes to the list, to the date that the addition or change took effect. While the previous limitations were helpful in encouraging ratepayers to submit appeals early, the initial six months limit in particular prompted some ratepayers to submit appeals as a purely precautionary measure that were subsequently not pursued. Removing the need for appeals to be made until ratepayers are satisfied that they need and wish to proceed should reduce costs for both individual ratepayers and for the national taxpayer in administering the system, and should allow appeals that are pursued to be resolved more quickly.

We also propose that ratepayers should be restricted to a single appeal against the original 2005 valuation and against any subsequent alteration. At present duplicate appeals can be submitted by ratepayers or their agents in different formats or even by several agents in respect of the same property. Each one must be registered as a separate appeal. This causes unnecessary work and cost in administering the system and slows down the handling of appeals. As a further aid to speeding up the consideration of cases it is proposed that ratepayers should be required to provide basic rental information with the appeal. This is the single most important piece of information for the valuation officer in considering the need to alter a rateable value but it is often not provided until very late in the appeals process. Providing it at the start should allow cases to be resolved more quickly and with fewer cases going to valuation tribunal.

Further details of these proposals and some more minor technical changes will be set out in a consultation paper to be issued next month. It is estimated that the effect of the proposed changes would be to reduce the number of appeals by at least 120,000 over the life of the list. This should speed up the resolution of appeals and make the administration of the system cheaper and easier for all concerned.

The proposals complement other initiatives already being taken forward by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Valuation Office Agency as part of revaluation 2005 to make the valuation system more open, transparent and user friendly.

Home Fire Risk Checks

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): I am announcing today £25 million in capital grants to all English fire and rescue authorities over four years. The grants will total £5 million annually in the first three years, rising to £10 million in the final year, 2007–08. The funding is provided to establish a programme of home fire risk checks (HFRCs)—home visits to provide advice on fire risks and how to prevent fire, tailored to the circumstances of the household. The visits will be combined with installation of free 10-year smoke alarms.

The initiative will be targeted on the most vulnerable households—particularly the elderly, but also deprived households and areas, young families and black and minority ethnic communities. Grants will be allocated on the basis of regional smoke alarm ownership, and within each region on the basis of the fire index, mainly measures of deprivation, weighted by population. The regional allocations will be announced in due course.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

United Nations

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): Tomorrow, I will lay before Parliament a Command Paper on the United Kingdom in the United Nations

(CM 6325). Copies will be placed in the Library of the House and will be available from the Vote Office in the House of Commons and the printed paper office in the House of Lords. A copy will also be available on the Foreign and Commonwealth Office websitewww.fco.gov.uk.

This Command Paper is the second in a series of annual papers on the UK's engagement with the United Nations. This year's edition contains a foreword by the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs. It is published to coincide with a Parliamentary debate on 28 October, as well as two major events: the UK Presidency of the UN Security Council this month, and the main session of the UN General Assembly.

The United Nations carries out very important work. Yet many of us are unaware of much of this work. This paper aims to outline the wide range of activity that the organisation is involved in, and the many ways that the UK supports this work. It also demonstrates how the UN has a positive influence on the daily lives of members of the public.

The UN has been in the forefront of international news over the last year and is being asked to tackle an increasing number of issues—from violent conflict to sustainable development—in an increasing number of locations—from Afghanistan to Haiti. This activity can only be carried out effectively by a UN that is efficient and focused on the most important priorities. This year's report therefore concentrates on efforts to reform the United Nations and its constituent bodies. The UK is fully committed to the UN. As a strong supporter of the UN, we believe that only through continuous adaptation can it meet the challenges of the modern world.

HEALTH

Social Care Services

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): The Social Care Institute for Excellence (SCIE) was established in October 2001 to help raise the standard of social care services by developing and promoting knowledge about good practice in social care. It is a not-for-profit company and a registered charity. It is funded primarily by the Department of Health by way of a grant.

The Department proposes to help deliver further improvements across social care and health services through a dedicated care services improvement partnership that would be part of SCIE. The Department is currently exploring this with SCIE's trustees, who have broadly welcomed the proposal, and is working up details of how these arrangements can be achieved. This partnership would draw together seven existing initiatives, listed at the conclusion of this statement, into a single coherent framework through which local organisations in England can be helped to provide better services for people and communities with a range of care and support needs. It is proposed that most of this support will be delivered through eight regional centres based on the existing regional development centres operated by the National Institute for Mental Health in England.

SCIE are currently consulting on behalf of the Department on the improvement of services to adults. I intend to present a Green Paper to this House following that consultation detailing my plans for service improvement. The creation of the care services improvement partnership will support the delivery of the objectives within the Green Paper.

The arrangement is subject to final approval by SCIE's board of trustees and to the Charity Commission being content with the changes that this will mean for SCIE. From tomorrow the Department and SCIE will be consulting a wide range of groups and organisations across the statutory, voluntary and private sectors, including those which involve service users and carers, about the proposed partnership and how it could be developed.

It is proposed to include within the new partnership the following existing initiatives:

Modernisation agency change for children team
Health and social care change agent team
Integrated care network
Integrating community equipment services team
National Child and Adolescent Mental Health Support Service
National Institute for Mental Health in England
Valuing people support team.

The Welsh Assembly Government are considering the implications of these developments for its relationship with SCIE.

PRIME MINISTER

Review Body on Senior Salaries (Report on Parliamentary Pay and Allowances 2004)

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): I have today laid before both Houses the Review Body on Senior Salaries report on parliamentary pay and allowances 2004. Copies are available in the Vote Office and the Library of the House. I am grateful to John Baker and the members of the Review Body for their work. The Government have noted their recommendations on pay, allowances and pensions. Implementation of these recommendations will be a matter for decision by Parliament.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Discretionary Social Fund

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be making a number of minor changes to the discretionary social fund with effect from 25 October 2004. The changes to the fund are minor clarifications of guidance and directions, and, in the main, are consequential to legislative changes made in respect of other social security benefits. Details of the changes have been placed in the Library.

CABINET OFFICE

Parliamentary Commission Order 2004

The Minister for the Cabinet Office (Ruth Kelly): An order has been laid before Parliament today to extend the jurisdiction of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration to include the role of the Government Actuary's Department in relation to the prudential regulation of insurers prior to this function being transferred to the Financial Services Authority in April 2001. This will enable the parliamentary ombudsman to conduct a full investigation into Equitable Life.

TREASURY

Pensions Tax Simplification

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): The new simplified regime for taxation of pensions starts on 6 April 2006. To achieve the levels of efficiency and effectiveness that both we and the pension industry want from the new regime, I can today announce that registered pension schemes will be required to send online forms and make electronic payments to the Inland Revenue from the start of the new regime on 6 April 2006.

The decision to move to a fully online service was taken after extensive discussions with the industry over the summer.

There are still a number of issues of detail on how precisely we can achieve an e-based regime and we will be asking the pensions industry, software suppliers and other interested parties to work closely with us on this.

The Inland Revenue will be publishing a short paper early next month outlining the key issues and areas they would like to work on together with those who will be involved in registered pension schemes.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

AU Mission (Darfur)

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): The Government welcome the African Union decision of 20 October to expand its Ceasefire Monitoring Commission in Darfur from approximately 500 people to more than 3,000. As the Prime Minister in Addis on 7 October said:

> "The AU is playing an absolutely vital lead role in trying to resolve this crisis, both by bringing the Government and the rebels together, to try to resolve the conflict peacefully and, meanwhile, monitoring that they are observing their interim ceasefire agreement".

The UK has already given significant support to the AU mission. We contributed £2 million to help jump-start the mission in May, and we provided airlift for the 150 Nigerian troops that joined the mission in August, as well as rations packs to feed these people. We have also provided technical planning expertise for the AU, and seconded a British monitor to the mission.

As the Prime Minister announced in Addis, we will of course play our part in supporting the expanded mission. We have set aside a further £12 million for this purpose, and are working hard to ensure that these people can be deployed quickly. We are discussing with the AU and other donors, including the European Commission, what more we can all do to support the mission.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Regional Development Agencies (Appointments)

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Jacqui Smith): I would like to inform Members of the House that, as part of a rolling programme of appointments, I have decided to appoint four new board members to the Northwest Development Agency. The new appointees will take up their positions on 14 December 2004 and their names are set out below.

The new board members will replace members whose terms of office end in December this year, and they will bring experiences from business and local authorities.

Decisions on the appointments have been made following open competition in accordance with the guidelines set down in the Commissioner for Public Appointments code of practice, and following consultation with key national and regional players.

Public Guardianship Office

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): The Public Guardianship Office's annual report and accounts for 2003–04 have been laid before Parliament today. This document gives full details of the agency's performance and expenditure for that year. Copies of the report have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Milton Keynes South Midlands Sub-Regional Strategy

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Keith Hill): My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister is today publishing the revised consultation draft Milton Keynes and south midlands sub-regional strategy. The Milton Keynes and south midlands growth area is one of the four growth areas set out in the Government's sustainable communities plan published in February 2003. The plan was not simply about housing, it was about creating sustainable communities in all parts of the country. One of the key objectives of the plan is to tackle the long-term shortage of housing and particularly affordable housing. The revised consultation draft sub-regional strategy, being published today, is the next stage in the testing and examination through the regional spatial strategy (RSS) process.

The Milton Keynes and south midlands sub-region includes the area from Corby in the north to Aylesbury in the south and from Daventry in the west to Bedford in the east. Its largest urban centres are Milton Keynes, Northampton, Luton-Dunstable-Houghton Regis and Bedford-Kempston. The sub-regional strategy sets out the scale and form of development in Milton Keynes south midlands to 2031.

This document incorporates the proposed changes to the consultation draft published by the regional assemblies for the east of England, the east midlands and the south-east in July 2003. The proposed changes published today build on the July 2003 strategy and also take full account of the recommendations contained in the report of the independent panel, published in August 2004, which proposed approximately 170,000 new homes by 2021. The panel published their report following the five-week public examination held in March and April 2004.

Copies of the revised consultation draft sub-regional strategy, together with the explanatory table of proposed changes, have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Under national guidance, the proposed changes will be subject to public consultation over an eight-week period, commencing today. Details of the consultation process are provided in the foreword to the revised consultation draft sub-regional strategy published today.

Once the final version of the sub-regional strategy is published, as a revision to the regional spatial strategies for the south-east, east of England, and east midlands, it will form part of the regional policy basis for the preparation of statutory local development documents by the local planning authorities within the sub-region. It is at this stage that detailed site specific and locational proposals will be brought forward to implement the sub-regional strategy. This process provides further requirements for public consultation and stakeholder involvement.

Increasing the number of homes and affordable homes in the wider south-east is essential if we are to have sustainable communities, and we recognise that it is critical that this growth is itself sustainable. This means that we will ensure that new communities have the infrastructure that they need such as schools, transport and health facilities. We will also continue to ensure that brownfield land is used first, improve the environmental efficiency of homes, and create new green spaces and places that will stand the test of time.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Kyoto Protocol

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): On 22 October the state Duma, Russia's lower House of Parliament, voted overwhelmingly in favour of the Kyoto protocol, thereby taking Russia one step nearer to its ratification. The Duma approved Kyoto by an impressive 334 votes in favour with only 73 votes against. The protocol will now be passed to the Russian Parliament's upper House, the Federation Council, for its approval before being returned to president Putin for final signature. Ratification by Russia would bring about the entry into force of the protocol, making it legally binding.

I warmly welcome the decision of the Duma to approve ratification. Russia is showing the rest of the world that climate change is a serious problem that needs to be tackled by serious action. The entry into force of the Kyoto protocol would represent a significant step forward in the global fight to address the problem of climate change.

I look forward to working closely with Russia at the 10th conference of the parties to the framework convention on climate change in Buenos Aires in December, and in the future in implementing our collective obligations.

HOME DEPARTMENT

National Offender Management Service

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): Over 400 responses were received to the two written consultation exercises undertaken so far in respect of the National Offender Management Service. The majority of responses indicate strong support for the new service and the concept of end-to-end offender management.

A summary of responses is available in the House Library. It will also be available to staff and other key stakeholders through the prisons, probation, and Home Office websites.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Probation Board

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Paul Murphy): I have today received copies of the annual report of the Probation Board for Northern Ireland for the financial year 2003–04. The report outlines the board's performance against targets during that year.

Copies of the report have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

EU Emissions Trading Scheme

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): The Government today announced proposals on the total number of greenhouse gas emission allowances to be allocated to UK industry as part of the first phase of the EU emissions trading scheme.

The UK published its national allocation plan in May, setting out provisional allocation levels for the first phase of EU emissions trading (which runs from 2005–07). These were based on interim projections of emissions over the period. The allocations have now been reviewed in the light of ongoing work on the projections and the new climate change agreement targets agreed with industry.

Emissions by UK installations covered by the EU emissions trading scheme for the period 2005–07 are now estimated to be 56.1 million tonnes CO_2 (or 7.6 per cent.) higher than was the case in April. The Government have considered how to reflect in their plan this increase in emissions from the interim April projections.

The Government are planning to propose to the Commission an amendment to the national allocation plan increasing the total number of UK allowances for the period 2005–07 by 19.8 million allowances. This is an increase of less than 3 per cent. from the number in the April plan.

The proposal would set out the overall number of allowances for UK industry at a challenging but achievable level. This balances the need to protect the competitive position of UK industry while moving us beyond our Kyoto Protocol commitment towards our tougher national goal.

The EU emissions trading scheme is a vital part of our drive to reduce greenhouse gas emissions across Europe. The proposed approach moves us further towards our climate change objectives, while taking account of the changes to the underlying projections.

HEALTH

Adult Social Care

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): We have made a commitment to review the national minimum standards for social care, made under the Care Standards Act 2000, within three years of their introduction. The Government are now beginning the review of the standards and the associated legislative framework for adult social care. Following the review, we will carefully consider the case for change. We intend to implement any changes to the adult social care standards in 2006.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Forced Marriage

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): A forced marriage is one where one or both of the spouses do not consent to the marriage or where consent is extracted through duress. Duress includes both physical and emotional pressure. Forced marriage is an abuse of human rights and a form of domestic violence that the Government are determined to tackle. It cannot be justified on any religious or cultural basis. With this in mind the Government are today announcing a package of new measures designed to combat the abuse. These are:

> A joint Home Office—Foreign Office forced marriage unit (FMU), to be operational by the end of the year. This will be the government's central unit dealing with forced marriage casework, policy and projects. It will provide information and assistance both to potential victims and to concerned professionals;
> A consultation later this year on whether to create a specific criminal offence of forcing someone into marriage. This will fully engage with victims of forced marriage, women's groups and non governmental organisations to consider how best the law can be used to support victims;
> Forced marriage will be targeted as a specific abuse that the Government are determined to tackle in the revision of the key inter-agency guidance on safeguarding and promoting the welfare of children. This guidance will have statutory backing. This will help to ensure best practice guidance for social workers (issued in March of this year) and education professionals (to be issued in December of this year) on how to tackle forced marriage will be implemented across the country, with many more cases being successfully identified and dealt with;
> The minimum age for marriage entry clearance will be raised from 16 to 18. This is to give those who face forced marriage extra time in which to mature and resist familial pressure for them to enter a marriage that they do not want. In support of this an extra entry clearance officer will be posted in Islamabad to help these reluctant spouses. This officer will also assist those who have been abandoned in Pakistan by their partners and who have the right to return to the UK. This will increase our ability to support victims and stop further abuse in the wake of forced marriage.

Forced marriage is, of course, very different from arranged marriage, where the families of both spouses take a leading role in arranging the marriage but the choice whether or not to accept the arrangement remains with the prospective couple.

Identity Cards

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): I am today publishing the Government's response to the Home Affairs Committee's report on identity cards and a summary of the findings of consultation and research based on the draft Identity Cards Bill which was published on 26 April 2004 (CM 6178).

The Home Affairs Committee has carried out an inquiry into identity cards. This was announced in November 2003 with the following terms of reference:

> "The Committee will inquire into all aspects of identity cards, including the practical aspects of the Government's proposals and of any future schemes, and will examine the Government's draft Bill. Among the questions they will consider are:
> the practical issues involved in the ID database and biometric identifiers;
> the security and integrity of the proposed system;
> the operational use of ID cards in establishing identity, accessing public services, and tackling illegal migration, crime, and terrorism;
> issues to be addressed in the longer-term, including compulsion; and > the estimated cost of the system."

The Committee's report, which covered both their inquiry and their pre-legislative scrutiny of the draft Bill, was published in July this year.

The Government welcome the contribution made by the Committee. Its comments have been carefully considered and many of them are reflected in revisions to the draft Bill or will be taken up later at the implementation stage. We hope that legislation to build a base for a compulsory national identity cards scheme will be introduced as soon as feasible.

Copies of the Government's response and the summary of findings are available in the Vote Office and the Printed Paper Office and have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. They can also be viewed on the identity cards website: www.identitycards.gov.uk.

TRANSPORT

Highways Agency Development Control Policy

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Mr. Tony McNulty): This statement supplements Roads Circular 4/2001: "Control of Development Affecting Trunk Roads and Agreements with Developers under Section 278 of the Highways Act 1980".

Review of Policy

The Department for Transport, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Highways Agency have been carrying out a review of the existing development control policy to see if there are any measures that could be introduced to speed up development where possible. As a result of this work the Highways Agency proposes to implement the measures outlined below.

Development in Advance of Completion of Road Improvement

The Highways Agency has considered and agreed to allow, where possible and at the request of the developer, all development to go ahead in parallel with any road infrastructure improvements being carried out under an s278 agreement. This will be subject to safety considerations and on the understanding that the Highways Agency cannot be held accountable for any delays to the road works or resulting delays for the developer.

This change would mean that developers could access sites earlier, start work and have, for example, houses ready for immediate occupation as soon as the road infrastructure was completed.

Increased use of Trigger Points

In addition, the Highways Agency has agreed to consider the use of "trigger points" so that where there is any surplus capacity in an existing network developers could utilise that capacity in their proposals. This means that developers will be allowed to proceed with their development up to an agreed point, a point where the traffic generation matches the reserve capacity. This point will usually be assessed on a given floor area for an industrial development or a specified number and size of houses for a housing development.

This change means that, where there is any surplus capacity in an existing network, developers will be able to complete and have occupied specified parts of a proposed development in advance of any network improvements required under an s278 agreement.

Time scale

These changes to the existing development control policy will be implemented with immediate effect.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Employers Liability Compulsory Insurance

The Minister for Work (Jane Kennedy): Further to the written statement on 4 December by my hon. Friend the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration I am pleased to announce the publication today of the "Framework for Vocational Rehabilitation" and its associated annex.

Vocational rehabilitation can form an essential component of best health and safety practice. Good rehabilitation programmes enable employers to retain experienced staff who add value to their business. Equally it enables workers who would otherwise be retired as medically unfit to continue in their chosen employment.

The discussion paper has been placed in the Library.

TREASURY

Citizen Information Project

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Paul Boateng): On January 6 2004, Official Report, column 7WS, I announced that the Registrar General for England and Wales would lead on the next stage of development work for a UK population register. This work is being conducted by a project team based within the Office for National Statistics (ONS) and is known as the citizen information project (CIP). It is concerned with whether or not the use of a population register would improve the quality of basic data held by Government, generate efficiency savings across Government and support improved public services. I am now able to update the House on progress and on the programme of work over the rest of this stage of development.

The work has confirmed the feasibility study findings that a UK population register has the potential to generate efficiency benefits and service improvements across Government. The CIP team has investigated the costs and benefits of a range of potential options for delivering a population register. It has recommended that proposals for a national identity register (NIR), as part of the Government's proposals for ID cards, mean that if ID cards were to become compulsory then it may be more cost effective to deliver these benefits through the NIR, rather than develop a separate register. The Government have accepted this recommendation.

ONS is now in the second stage of project definition and will report to Ministers by June 2005. This includes examining in more detail how the NIR could function as a population register and exploring opportunities for adding value to existing database developments that could be cost effective ahead of the NIR reaching maturity. ONS is also exploring how efficiency and analytical requirements that cover the whole population, rather than just adults, can be met.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Judicial Appointments Annual Report to Parliament

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): The judicial appointments annual report, covering the period 1 April 2003 to 31 March 2004, is published tomorrow, 29 October. This year the report focuses on developments and achievements within the judicial appointments process and the work undertaken ahead of the new judicial appointments commission. We have taken the opportunity to avoid duplication of data by placing the statistical tables and their supporting narrative on the Departmental website,www.dca.gov.uk. The report also shows that:

> Some 480 appointments were made in 2003-04 from around 3,000 applications.
> Appointments, including lay appointments, of minority ethnic candidates rose by 6 per cent. from 8.90 per cent. in 2002-03 to 14.80 per cent. and is more than triple the 1999-2000 figure.
> Women accounted for 32.92 per cent. of appointments, a slight increase on last year's figures.
> The success of the early assessment centre pilots has led to all deputy district judge competitions being conducted by assessment centres and the planned introduction of similar centres for recorder and employment tribunal competitions.

Copies of the report will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The report is also available on the internet.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Gibraltar

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): I visited Madrid for bilateral talks with my Spanish counterpart, Miguel Angel Moratinos, on 27 October. The following joint statement was agreed at this meeting:

> "The Ministers for Foreign Affairs of Spain and the United Kingdom, Miguel Angel Moratinos and Jack Straw, have met in Madrid on 27 October 2004. During their meeting they discussed Gibraltar.
> The Ministers have agreed to consider and consult further on how to establish a new forum for dialogue on Gibraltar, with an open agenda, in which Gibraltar would have its own voice. The modalities for this dialogue will be agreed by all the concerned parties.
> Minister Straw welcomes the decision of the Spanish Government to promote local co-operation between Gibraltar and its surrounding area. Both Ministers are glad about the establishment of a Joint Committee Gibraltar Government-Maacomunidad del Campo de Gibraltar to promote the identification and implementation of mutually beneficial local co-operation projects and wish to set out their support for this initiative because of its intrinsic value and the confidence-building atmosphere that it could create. It is understood that for the Spanish Government this local co-operation is within the objectives of the Spanish Government in relation to the sovereignty of Gibraltar. It is also understood that the British Government fully maintains its commitment to honour the wishes of the people of Gibraltar as set out in the preamble of the 1969 Constitution.
> In the Annex are set out several co-operation measures to facilitate the start of the work of the previously mentioned forum.
> Annex
> To explore the possibilities to reach an agreement on the airport of Gibraltar under a formula acceptable to all parties.
> To allow the inclusion of Spanish airports as alternative airports in the flight plans whose final destination is the airport of Gibraltar.
> To establish a technical working party to examine and to exchange information on the pensions issue of Spanish ex-workers in Gibraltar, without prejudice to any outcome in respect thereof.
> The Spanish Government shall allow calls at Spanish ports of all pleasure cruise liners having the port of Gibraltar as a previous or subsequent port of call, without any restriction."

I was in contact with the Chief Minister of Gibraltar, Peter Caruana, throughout these discussions. The Chief Minister authorised me to say that he was entirely content with the terms of the joint press release.

WORK AND PENSIONS

New Child Support Scheme: Progress Report

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Alan Johnson): The new arrangements for child support came into operation for new cases and some linked old scheme cases from 3 March 2003. Ongoing problems remain with the new computer and telephony systems and this has meant that progress has been slower than anticipated. The Department continues to withhold substantial payments from EDS. The payment each year is determined by the contract and is linked to service levels and to the degree of functionality delivered. Between 3 March 2003 and 19 September 2004, the agency retained £12.1 million of payments due to EDS because of performance problems.

The Child Support Agency is working to improve compliance and increase its clearance rates. The number of cases cleared this quarter was over 40,000, taking the total number of clearances, calculations and closures, to over 238,000 for the scheme to date.

The agency now has the information required to make reasonable assessments of compliance, thus improving their ability to start properly to manage performance in this area. Figures for this quarter show an average monthly performance estimated at just over 50 per cent. for both cash and case compliance. This is too low, but with reliable information now available the agency can better plan to improve this. The agency has recently appointed a new director of enforcement to lead the work on this.

The poorest families are benefiting from the new scheme with a further 8,000 families receiving child maintenance premium during this last quarter. This brings the total number of beneficiaries to over 33,000.

Achievement of the agency's accuracy target is determined at the end of March 2005 by means of a special exercise. However, the current level of accuracy, to the nearest penny, is estimated at 83 per cent. against a target of 90 per cent.

The agency recognises that performance this quarter has fallen back in some areas, partly reflecting time invested in extra training following their decision further to prioritise activity on compliance. This should permit a more balanced approach to managing cases from first application to first payment and the agency's executive managers assure me that they anticipate that this will lead to progressive improvements in performance levels over the next year, as the new arrangements become more established and better information becomes available to enable performance improvements to be targeted more effectively.

Notes:

1. Average weekly child support maintenance payments to parents with care are shown in the table. Figures are for September 2004 only and are calculated as the total amount received and allocated divided by the number of cases.

2. Figures from Quarter 4 2003–04 onwards and scheme to date figures include clerical cases, new scheme cases unable to be progressed on the new system. Quarter 2 figures also incorporate some adjustments to take account of a reconciliation of clerical cases. The clerical case position is as follows:

	Scheme to June 2004	Scheme to September 2004
Applications cleared	1,345	2,130
Maintenance calculations	1,134	1,937
Closures	211	193

3. Applications close for a variety of reasons. The main reasons are that the parent with care withdraws the application, perhaps due to reconciliation, or having agreed private arrangements with the non-resident parent.

4. Figures for child maintenance premium payments include an estimate of the number of parents who receive the premium by way of a disregard to their income support/income-based jobseekers allowance.

5. A proportion of cases that have a maintenance calculation in place may already be receiving payment directly, but will not be reflected in the figures shown above.

Cold Weather Payments Scheme

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): I am pleased to announce that, following advice from the Meteorological Office, the annual review of the cold weather payments scheme has now been completed. Amending regulations were laid on 11 October and will come into force on 1 November, in time for the beginning of the winter period.

One of the weather stations used in the scheme last winter, Ringway, is closing and one new weather station is being introduced at Woodford to provide data for the scheme. In addition to changing 12 weather station linkages to more representative links, 12 postcode to weather station linkages have been changed on the advice of the Meteorological Office following representations made by hon. Members. An error from last year's scheme affecting one postcode has been corrected.

I have written to each of the hon. Members affected by these changes.

In order to maintain the policy intention of making cold weather payments to vulnerable groups, people in receipt of income support or income based jobseekers allowance who are also receiving the disability element of child tax credit have been added to the list of eligible customers.

Cold weather payments are separate from, and in addition to, winter fuel payments that are paid to eligible people from age 60.

TRANSPORT

Speed Cameras

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the cost of funding an independent audit of every speed camera. [188154]

Mr. Jamieson: The 35 English and Welsh safety camera partnerships participating in the national programme confirmed to my Department in January this year that they were operating camera sites—lists of which my Department published in June and placed in the Libraries of the House—in line with the Department's rules and guidance for the programme.

I therefore do not regard a further audit as necessary. The cost of such an audit is estimated to be £200,000 or more.

Buses

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the quality bus contracts which have been agreed to date, giving the value, length and date signed in each case. [190069]

Charlotte Atkins: No quality bus contracts have to date been submitted to the Secretary of State for approval. We have issued for consultation draft guidance on the application procedure and the criteria for approval of schemes. As announced in the "Future of Transport" White Paper, we intend to streamline the statutory procedure by reducing the minimum period between making and implementing a scheme from the current 21 months to six months. Our guidance will make clear that use of the minimum period will only be appropriate for schemes with a limited impact on bus operators.

Cars

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the estimated number of cars licensed in Britain was in (a) 1975, (b) 1985, (c) 1995 and (d) 2004. [189938]

Mr. Jamieson: The number of cars licensed in Great Britain, excluding exempt vehicles, at the end of each year requested was as follows:

	Number of cars
1975	12,526,000
1985	16,454,000
1995	20,505,000
2003	24,985,000

Congestion Charges/Road Pricing

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans his Department has to introduce (a) congestion charges and (b) road pricing on roads in West Leeds; and if he will make a statement. [189952]

Mr. Jamieson: It is up to local authorities to decide whether or not to use the permissive powers of the Transport Act 2000 to introduce congestion charging in their areas.

Driving Licences

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many current UK driving licences were in circulation in (a) 1975, (b) 1985, (c) 1995 and (d) 2003. [189927]

Mr. Jamieson: The information requested is as follows:

Licence type	[1]1975	1985	1995	2003
Provisional	1,700,000	4,038,334	4,764,525	6,225,946
Full	19,400,000	25,702,696	31,670,582	33,771,687
Total	21,100,000	29,741,030	36,435,107	40,027,633

[1] Estimated

Highways Agency

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the (a) budget and (b) staffing figures for the Highways Agency has been in each year since 1997; and how many new Highways Agency roads were constructed in each of those years. [190174]

Mr. Darling: The financial resources allocated to, and consumed by, the Highways Agency in each year since 1997 are identified in the agency's published annual Business Plans for the years 1996–97 to 2004–05 and Annual Reports and Accounts for the years 1996–97 to 2002–03. Staffing figures are also identified in those publications, as are details of progress on the agency's major road construction and improvement schemes.

Leeds City Station

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what his Department's estimate is of the line capacity of the heavy rail links into Leeds City Station. [189922]

Mr. McNulty: The Strategic Rail Authority (SRA) advises that there is no simple way of defining the capacity of an individual station or route. The theoretical maximum capacity will be much greater than the actual capacity of an operational railway providing the mixture of services that demand dictates at an acceptable level of operational performance. The SRA's programme of Route Utilisation Strategies currently determines the most effective use of the network infrastructure. In accordance with the Government's White Paper "The Future of Rail", Network Rail will take on responsibility for drawing up these strategies, for agreement by Government.

Motor Cycle Accidents

Tom Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many people have been killed in motorcycle accidents in the United Kingdom in each of the last three years. [190250]

Mr. Jamieson: The information requested is not available for the United Kingdom.

The number of people killed in accidents in Great Britain involving at least one motorcycle for each of the last three years is shown, in the table.

Number of fatalities in accidents involving a motorcycle:

Year	Killed
2001	643
2002	656
2003	742

Motorway Traffic Officers

Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport who employs motorway traffic officers; and what their (a) job description, (b) duties and (c) responsibilities are. [189497]

Mr. Jamieson: Traffic Officers (TOs) are directly employed by Highways Agency and will be designated to act on behalf of the Secretary of State in accordance with the Traffic Management Act. The Traffic Management Act 2004 sets out how the traffic officers will use their special powers in relation to managing congestion and the avoidance of danger to motorists.

There is a phased programme for the migration of functions from the police to Highways Agency traffic officers, to ensure that their responsibilities are undertaken in a safe and effective manner. The TOs will only undertake safety critical functions when they are accredited as being fully competent. A copy of the job description that describes the roles, responsibilities and main duties of the TOs in the West Midlands has been placed in the Libraries of the House. Not all of the responsibilities detailed in the job description will be undertaken until this phased programme of migration has taken place and further secondary legislation has been developed.

Network Rail

Mr. Grieve: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the contingent liability in his Department's accounts of £21 billion principal for Network Rail's borrowing relates to. [189447]

Mr. McNulty: Details of the £21 billion principal of contingent liabilities in support of Network Rail's borrowing are set out in the Secretary of State for Transport's minutes to Parliament of 27 June 2002 and 4 February 2004.

Details of proposed new contingent liabilities relating to Network Rail's planned Debt Insurance Programme are contained in a minute from the Secretary of State for Transport laid before Parliament on 15 September 2004.

Railways

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport who will be responsible for the regional planning assessments in the Rail Review; and how the Rail Review takes passengers' concerns into account. [189332]

Mr. McNulty: The Department is currently discussing with the SRA, the ORR and the rail industry the details of how planning, including the regional planning assessments, will be conducted in future. Passengers views and concerns will be taken into account through a reformed Rail Passenger Council.

Mr. Truswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what improvements have been made to rolling stock on the Wharfedale Line since 1997; what contribution to those improvements came from public funds; what plans there are for further improvements; and whether Strategic Rail Authority resources previously earmarked for future increases in capacity are still available. [189727]

Mr. McNulty: As part of the specification for the Arriva Trains Northern franchise 16 new 3-car Class 333 EMUs were introduced in 2000. The SRA provided funding of £3,397,000 for a further eight vehicles to be available by September 2001 and £2,858,900 for another eight vehicles to be available by December 2003. There are currently no plans for SRA funding for further investment in rolling stock.

Mr. Boris Johnson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what guidance he has given to First Great Western Link on the proposed reclassification of the Henley-Twyford branch line as a community railway. [190217]

Mr. McNulty: None. The Strategic Rail Authority has proposed the designation of a number of local lines as Community Railways to allow them to be developed with the involvement of the local community. There will be consultation with local authorities before any route is designated.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many miles of track there are in the rail network. [189599]

Mr. McNulty: Network Rail advises that its network comprises 19,698 miles of track.

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what consultation he has (a) undertaken and (b) planned on the structure of the rail franchises in South Essex; and if he will make a statement; [189516]

(2) what plans he has to change the franchise structures of the (a) Fenchurch Street and (b) Liverpool Street rail lines. [189517]

Mr. McNulty: The Future of Rail White Paper proposes to reduce the number of franchises and we will be considering a range of options. This work is at an early stage but we will engage fully with the industry and consult stakeholders before finalising any proposals. As we have made clear, there is no question of contracts being broken.

Vehicle Manoeuvres/Pollution

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a comparative assessment of (a) the effect on the safety of road users and (b) the level of pollutants emitted when a road vehicle performs (i) a u-turn and (ii) a three-point turn. [189821]

Mr. Jamieson: The safety aspects of any vehicle manoeuvre will be dictated by individual circumstances. Drivers have a responsibility for ensuring that any manoeuvre that has the potential to bring their vehicle into conflict with other road users is carried out in a manner that is safe, legal and convenient to do so. Drivers must also consider if they can control their vehicles in the given circumstances and, while knowledge of the Highway Code will help, if there is any doubt in the driver's mind, neither manoeuvre should be carried out and an alternative method of turning found.

With regards to effects on pollutant emissions, no comparative assessments have been made and none are planned since, due to the infrequency of these manoeuvres, the impact on air quality would be negligible. However, in general terms, a higher level of pollutants might be expected from three-point turns due to the stop/start nature of the exercise.

Road Traffic Accidents

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of road traffic accident deaths were non-car owners or drivers in (a) 1975, (b) 1980, (c) 1990, (d) 2000 and (e) 2003. [189937]

Mr. Jamieson: The information is not available.

Tom Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many people have been (a) injured and (b) killed in road traffic accidents within the Greater London area in each of the last three years. [190257]

Mr. Jamieson: The table shows numbers killed and injured on the roads within Greater London in each of the last three years.

Year	Killed	Injured
2001	300	44,322
2002	281	41,227
2003	272	38,205

Severn Crossings

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport for what reasons it is not possible to use a credit card to pay the toll for the Severn Crossings; and what plans he has to introduce this facility. [190460]

Mr. Jamieson: There are no plans at present to allow credit card payments due to the fact that finance companies levy up to a 3 per cent. surcharge for such transactions. Neither the Concessionaire (Severn River Crossing plc) nor the Government is currently prepared to fund this surcharge. However, the Concessionaire and the Government will continue to review this position.

Providing such a facility may also require amending the legislation that prescribes the manner of payment of tolls (The Severn Bridges Regulations 1996—SI 1316). This states that tolls, not already paid for in advance, must be paid in cash to an appointed person at a toll-booth or by the insertion of coins into a machine provided near a toll-booth for the purpose of collecting tolls.

The Concessionaire does operate a system for pre-payment.

Ship Inspections

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many ships were inspected at UK ports in July and August to assess whether they met International Ship and Port Facility Security Code standards; [188430]

(2) how many ships entering UK ports failed to meet the International Ship and Port Facility Security Code in July and August; and how many of these ships were (a) denied entry, (b) expelled from port and (c) detained. [188431]

Mr. Jamieson: The UK Government take a robust line with non-compliant ships seeking entry into their ports. We have a range of control measures in place for dealing with ships that are in violation of the International Ship and Port Facility Security (ISPS) Code.

It is not our policy to comment in detail on how many ships we inspect or have been denied entry, expelled, or detained at UK ports. However, between July and August 2004 Control Measures, including issuing letters of non-conformance to the ship and Flag State were taken against 17 ships (all foreign flagged).

Vehicle Excise Duty

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much he estimates is owed to the Government for non-payment of vehicle excise duty in respect of the last financial year for which figures are available; what action he is taking to reduce this figure; and if he will make a statement. [189220]

Mr. Jamieson: The last National Roadside Survey of vehicle excise duty (VED) evasion for which figures are available was carried out in June 2002. The survey indicated that the revenue lost from VED evasion was equivalent to 4.5 per cent. of the total revenue that should be raised. In 2002–03 this equated to £193 million which was offset by £110 million in fines, penalties and relicensing revenue through enforcement activities.

A range of measures was announced in May 2003 to modernise and tighten the vehicle registration system. These included Continuous Registration which was introduced in January 2004. All those not paying their road tax or declaring their vehicles off the road are detected from DVLA's records and sent a penalty notice. It is now no longer necessary to detect evaders using their vehicles on the road. Early indications are that this system will reduce the amount of VED evaded by around £70m in 2004–05.

Vehicle Identity Check Scheme

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what assessment he has made of the cost-effectiveness of the vehicle identity check scheme; and if he will make a statement; [189993]

(2) what plans he has to set up a review of the vehicle identity check scheme. [189994]

Mr. Jamieson: Data extracted from the police National Computer has shown a 7.8 per cent. decrease in car theft—equating to a total of 11,500 cars—in the scheme's first year of operation. On this basis, the total saving to the motorist and, of course, society as a whole, could be more than £58 million.

The scheme cost £12.5 million to set up and in 2003–04 cost £3.3 million to operate. I am therefore satisfied that the vehicle identity check system is cost effective.

The scheme is being closely monitored by the Department and will be subject to a formal review in April 2005.

WALES

Civil Service (Job Losses)

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which services within his Office will be (a) affected by and (b) subject to job losses consequent on the cuts in the civil service announced in the Spending Review. [189646]

Mr. Touhig: Full details of the work force changes announced in the Spending Review are being worked through, and we are consulting all stakeholders including unions and staff.

Departments will come forward in due course with details of workforce changes once plans are finalised.

Departmental Absenteeism

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what the absenteeism rate was for staff in his Department in each year since 1997. [185206]

Mr. Hain: Since the establishment of my Department on 1 July 1999 there has been no reported absenteeism.

Departmental Recycling

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what the latest available 12-month figures are for the proportion of the Department's redundant documentation, waste paper and card that is recycled; and if he will make a statement on the Department's recycling policy. [188700]

Mr. Touhig: The Wales Office uses the Department of Constitutional Affairs recycling scheme. In line with the Department of Constitutional Affairs (DCA), we are dedicated to sustainable development, and are currently working with DCA colleagues to introduce a comprehensive strategy and embed the principles into all aspects of our work.

Currently, all waste paper that can be recycled is disposed of in the appropriate manner, and all offices in the Wales Office have access to recycling bins. These are emptied on a daily basis and collected for recycling once a week. This generates between 10 and 20 full recycling bags each week, compared with up to 10 bags of ordinary rubbish.

Laura Ashley

Lembit Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with Laura Ashley concerning the future of Laura Ashley jobs in mid Wales; and if he will make a statement. [189612]

Mr. Touhig: While my right hon. Friend and I have not met the company recently, we are aware of the company's recent announcement that it intends to reduce it's work force at Newtown and Carno by up to 90. I very much regret the loss of these valuable jobs to the Mid Wales economy.

I understand that the company took this decision as part of its drive for greater operating efficiency and is currently in consultation with unions and those affected by the decision.

I am assured that the Assembly's Team Wales partners, including the Welsh Development Agency, are in regular discussions with the company about the situation and will provide all the support they can to find alternative employment for those affected. This includes opening discussions with other local companies currently looking to recruit staff.

Public Appointments

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will propose to the First Secretary of the National Assembly for Wales that he make a comparable assessment of the appointment systems for the Head of Public Sector Audit in Wales and the Comptroller and Auditor General in England, with particular reference to safeguards for the independence of the incumbent. [188562]

Mr. Hain: I am being consulted on the appointment process for the Auditor General for Wales. I am satisfied that it will conform to the Nolan principles and safeguard the independence of the Auditor General.

Travel Costs

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what the travel costs were of civil servants in (a) his Department and (b) its predecessor Department in each year since 1997. [183895]

Mr. Touhig: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) on 7 July 2004, Official Report, column 698W, which gives information about all travel costs incurred by the Wales Office.

The Wales Office has not previously distinguished between all of the travel costs for Ministers and civil servants, and could provide this information only at disproportionate cost.

All official travel is undertaken in accordance with the rules contained in the Civil Service Management Code.

Welsh Language

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many employees of the Wales Office speak Welsh. [188992]

Mr. Touhig: 9 per cent. of Wales Office staff are Welsh speakers. Others have some knowledge of the language.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

Sittings of the House

Mr. Gale: To ask the Leader of the House for how many (a) hours and (b) days the House has sat in each month during Session 2003–04. [190010]

Mr. Hain: The information requested is as follows:

Month	(a) Hours	(b) Days
November 2003	17h 52m	2
December 2003	93h 5m	12
January 2004	123h 3m	17
February 2004	103h 34m	14
March 2004	177h 44m	22
April 2004	81h 40m	11
May 2004	131h 12m	17
June 2004	117h 53m	16
July 2004	109h 29m	14
September 2004	57h 52m	7

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Armed Forces Investigations

Harry Cohen: To ask the Solicitor-General what the key role of the Attorney-General is in relation to armed forces investigations and possible prosecutions in respect of allegations of criminal mistreatment of Iraqis or of theft of Iraqi property; and if she will make a statement. [179796]

The Solicitor-General: The armed forces prosecuting authorities act independently of the military chain of command. They are subject to the general superintendence of the Attorney General. The current position in relation to the system for investigating and prosecuting soldiers currently serving in Iraq and which involve Iraqi civilians was set out in the written statement by the Attorney General, Official Report, House of Lords, 14 June 2004, c. WS 22–24.

The Attorney plays no role in relation to armed forces investigations. These are undertaken by the Royal Military Police or other service police authority for which the Secretary of State for Defence is responsible.

Departmental Accountancy Practice

Mr. Bacon: To ask the Solicitor-General who the Finance Director is of the (a) Crown Prosecution Service, (b) Serious Fraud Office and (c) Treasury Solicitor's Department is; what accountancy qualifications each Director holds; and on how many occasions there has been a qualified opinion on (i) the resource accounts and (ii) other accounts of each office in the last five years. [183432]

The Solicitor-General: The Finance Directors for the Law Officers' Departments are: Mr. John Graham, Crown Prosecution Service, Mr. David Partridge, Serious Fraud Office. Ms Hilary Jackson, Treasury Solicitor's Department carries out the functions of Finance Director as specified in HM Treasury's 'Government Accounting' in her role as Director of Corporate Strategy.

None of the Finance Directors above holds an accountancy qualification. The Director of Finance for the CPS is supported by staff with accountancy qualifications. The Finance Director of the Serious Fraud Office is supported by two fully qualified accountants in the finance team and his Head of Accountancy is a Management Board member. The Treasury Solicitor's Director of Finance and Information Systems is a Fellow of the Chartered Association of Certified Accountants. He is responsible for day to day financial management, reporting to the Director of Corporate Strategy, and is a member of the Board. The Treasury Solicitor's Board membership has included a fully qualified accountant since January 2001.

The Crown Prosecution Service's resource accounts for the years 1999–2000 to 2002–03 have been agreed by the National Audit Office without qualification. An audit opinion on the resource accounts for 2003–04 will be available later in the year.

The SFO's accounts received a qualified opinion in 2001–02. There have been no other qualified audit opinions.

The Treasury Solicitor's Department received qualified audit opinions on its resource and agency accounts in 1999–2000 and 2000–01. Audit opinion on the 2003–04 accounts will not be available until later in the year.

Departmental Administration Costs

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Solicitor-General what the administration costs were for (a) the Crown Prosecution Service, (b) the Serious Fraud Office and (c) the Treasury Solicitor's Department between the financial years 1996–97 and 1997–98. [186060]

The Solicitor-General: Details of the Law Officers' Departments gross running costs for 1996–97 and 1997–98 are contained in Table 5.5 of the Public Expenditure Statistical Analyses 2000–01 (Cm 4601). These figures are on a cash basis. From Public Expenditure Analyses 2001–02 (Cm 5101), departments' administrative expenditure was reported on a resource basis, as administration costs.

Departmental Staff (Upper Age Limits)

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Solicitor-General whether (a) her Department and (b) agencies for which it is responsible (i) have a set retirement age which applies to all or most personnel and (ii) have a maximum age beyond which applications for employment will not be considered; and what the age is in each case. [186079]

The Solicitor-General: The contractual normal retirement age for most staff in the Crown Prosecution Service is 60.

CPS policy does not deal specifically with this point but in practice the CPS would not normally consider applications for permanent employment if the applicant will have reached the normal contractual retirement age of 60, or beyond, before taking up an appointment.

The retirement age in operation at HM Crown Prosecution Service Inspectorate (HMCPSI) is 60 years. However, staff who wish to remain in post after the age of 60 may do so at the discretion of the chief inspector, who will take the following into consideration; the officer's performance, efficiency and HMCPSI's business requirements. Staff on loan from other Government Departments would be subject to the arrangements of the parent department.

Due to the nature of its work the Inspectorate would be unlikely to appoint an individual as an inspector who had less than three years to serve before his or her normal retirement age. However all decisions would be taken on the basis of performance, efficiency and management requirements.

The serious fraud office has a flexible retirement policy covering staff below the senior civil service. The policy offers a minimum retirement age of 60 years at which employees may opt to retire and receive full accrued superannuation benefits as of right. Employees cannot remain in employment beyond the day prior to their 65th birthday.

The normal retirement age for the senior civil service is 60. However, the serious fraud office has the flexibility to retain members of the senior civil service beyond 60 if it is judged to be in the public interest and is satisfied about the fitness and efficiency of the individual to carry out his or her duties.

There is no maximum age (save for the above policy) beyond which applications for employment will not be considered. Job applicants are made aware of the above policy in the application pack.

The Treasury Solicitor's Department and the Legal Secretariat to the Law Officers, have a 'normal' retirement age of 60 for all their staff. This is the minimum age at which, staff can retire with full superannuation benefits.

All staff must retire by age 65 except in wholly exceptional circumstances agreed by the Treasury Solicitor. Similarly applications from staff in the senior civil service, for an extension of service beyond age 60, are subject to the specific approval of the Treasury Solicitor.

There is no bar on age in relation to recruitment. For legal trainees, recruited through the Government Legal Service, there is a two year qualifying period (the training contract) after which, Departments will expect to receive a reasonable period of qualified service.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Solicitor-General how many road vehicles are operated by the Department and its agencies; how many personal injury accidents involving road vehicles operated by the Department have occurred within each of the last five years; and what the Department's policy is for managing work-related road safety. [185921]

The Solicitor-General: The Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) has an operational fleet of 18 vehicles. There is no record of any personal injury accidents involving the Department's vehicles within the last five years. The Department's policy and procedures for managing work-related road safety is contained within its Departmental Transport Guide.

HM Crown Prosecution Service Inspectorate (HMCPSI) does not operate any road vehicles. HMCPSI does use rental vehicles for its core work of visiting CPS sites for the purpose of inspections and some staff use their own vehicles. However, there have been no accidents over the last five years involving any personal injury. HMCPSI are committed to road safety and expect all drivers to show due care and attention to other users of the highway. The latest instruction has been to ensure all staff are aware of recent changes to the legislation on use of mobile phones while in a motor vehicle and to remind them of their statuary duty/obligation to comply with the law. HMCPSI include road safety as apart of the routine Health and Safety assessments to minimise risks.

The Treasury Solicitor's Department does not operate any road vehicles.

My own Department, the Legal Secretariat to the Law Officers has no vehicles. In respect of the ministerial cars used by the Attorney-General and myself, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the then Minister for the Cabinet Office and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Alexander) on 22 July 2004, Official Report, column 490W.

Information and Communication Specialists

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Solicitor-General how many information and communication technology specialists are in full-time employment in the Department. [189589]

The Solicitor-General: The Crown Prosecution Service employs 33 full-time information and communication technology specialists within its Business and Information Systems Directorate.

The SFO employs 24 information and technology specialists in total. These comprise:

Management team—3

Computer forensic specialists—11

Outsourced IT service—10

The management team and computer forensic specialists are full time civil servants. The outsourced IT service is contracted to IBM Global Services. In addition a range of IT support; system development and project management staff totalling 10 man years are employed on an ad hoc or consultancy basis. The outsourced service also provides IT support for my own office, the Legal Secretariat to the Law Officers, under an umbrella arrangement with the Serious Fraud Office. LSLO employs no information and communication technology specialists of its own.

The Treasury Solicitor's Department operates an in-house information service. There are currently 24 full-time information and communication technology specialists (ICT) in the Department. This comprises of 13 full-time permanent ICT specialists and 11 full-time contractor ICT specialists.

HM Crown Prosecution Service Inspectorate currently has no information and communication technology specialists in full-time employment.

Ministerial Air Travel

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Solicitor-General what the total cost of air travel between Northern Ireland and Great Britain was for (a) Ministers and (b) officials of the Law Officers' Department in the latest year for which figures are available. [182126]

The Solicitor-General: The cost of flights by members of HM Crown Prosecution Service Inspectorate to Northern Ireland during the financial year 2003–04 (the last full year for which figures are available) was £1,640.41. The expenditure was incurred through assistance to the Chief Inspector of Criminal Justice in Northern Ireland in accordance with the Justice (Northern Ireland) Act 2002 and through participation in the evaluation of pilot arrangements for establishment of the Public Prosecution Service of Northern Ireland.

The total cost to the Serious Fraud Office for the financial year 2003–04 was £10,336.31.

The Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) does not hold centrally, details about flight destinations and the costs of individual flights. The information sought for flights between Northern Ireland and Great Britain made by CPS officials in the CPS 42 areas could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. (Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, part 2, clause 9).

The Treasury Solicitor's Department does not hold centrally information in the form required and it could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. (Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, part 2, clause 9).

My own Department, the Legal Secretariat to the Law Officers, does not hold centrally information in the form required and it could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. (Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, part 2, clause 9).

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Adoption

Kevin Brennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how much has been spent on facilitation of inter-country adoption in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [188974]

Margaret Hodge: The UK Government do not actively promote intercountry or domestic adoption. Section 1 of the Adoption Act 1976 places a duty on all local authorities to provide an adoption service, including a service for intercountry adoption. The Intercountry Adoption Casework Team, a small team of staff based in the Department for Education and Skills provides a telephone and web-based information service to prospective adopters. It also manages the transfer of intercountry adoption applications overseas, ensuring that the documentation is complete and complies with UK legislative requirements. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office provides a legalisation service to intercountry adopters. Information on the total expenditure by central Government on the processing of intercountry adoption applications is not held centrally.

Kevin Brennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what steps he is taking to facilitate intercountry adoption from Bolivia to the UK. [188975]

Margaret Hodge: The UK Government do not actively promote intercountry adoption. The Government do provide a telephone and web-based information service to prospective adopters. It also manages the transfer of intercountry adoption applications overseas, ensuring that the documentation is complete and complies with UK legislative requirements. The Department for Education and Skills also acts as the Central Authority for England under The Hague Convention on Protection of Children and Co-operation in respect of Intercountry Adoption. The Central Authority for Wales is the National Assembly for Wales, for Scotland the Scottish Executive and for Northern Ireland the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. The role of the Central Authority is to ensure that the requirements laid down by the convention are fully met. The UK ratified the Hague Convention on Protection of Children and Co-operation in respect of Intercountry Adoption in 2003. Bolivia has also ratified the Hague Convention. The convention sets out clearly the principles which govern intercountry adoption policy, practice and procedure between contracting states. Principally these are to establish safeguards to ensure that intercountry adoptions take place in the best interests of the child and with respect for his or her fundamental rights as recognised in international law, to establish a system of co-operation amongst Contracting States to ensure that those safeguards are respected and thereby prevent the abduction, the sale of or traffic in children and to secure the recognition in Contracting States of adoptions made in accordance with the convention. Prior to the UK's ratification of the Hague Convention Bolivia has refused to accept applications for intercountry adoption. The Department for Education and Skills has subsequently received correspondence from the Bolivian authorities setting out their additional requirements in relation to intercountry adoption. However, we believe that the convention adequately addresses arrangements for adoption between contracting states.

Kevin Brennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many children have been adopted from overseas to the UK in the last five years, broken down by country of origin. [189032]

Margaret Hodge: There is no centrally held information on the number of children adopted from overseas to the UK in the last five years broken down by country of origin. However, the tables that give statistics for the number of applications received in the UK by country for the last five years, have been placed in the House Libraries.

Kevin Brennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assessment he has made of times for processing applications for inter-country adoption in the UK in comparison with other signatories to the Hague Convention. [189215]

Margaret Hodge: The Department for Education and Skills has not undertaken any assessment of processing times for England in comparison to other Hague signatories. Operational procedures and domestic legal frameworks governing the processing of intercountry adoption applications will vary considerably for each of the contracting States and it would therefore be difficult to draw any meaningful comparisons. There has been a substantial reduction in the average processing times for intercountry adoption applications in England over the last year.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many children aged (a) under one, (b) one to two, (c) three to four, (d) five to 10 and (e) 11 to 16 have been placed for adoption in the last 12 months. [189412]

Margaret Hodge: The attached table shows the number of children placed for adoption at 31 March 2003 who have been in that placement for 12 months or less, by age.

Children placed for adoption for 12 months or less at 31 March 2003

Child Care

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimate the Government has made of the average amount of money parents in England contribute to the cost of child care. [186863]

Margaret Hodge: A number of surveys of parents provide figures relating to the average amount parents pay for child care. Estimates differ depending on the methodology used.

According to the 'Repeat Survey of Parents Demand for Childcare'[1], households paying for childcare were spending on average £40 a week on child care. Half of these families paid up to £21 per week and one-in-ten paid more than £100.

The 2002 Families and Children Study[2] shows that the median total weekly child care costs among all paying families where the mother works were £25 per week in term-time and £35 per week in holidays.

The Government recognise that making child care affordable is a key challenge for the National Childcare Strategy and has made a substantial investment to achieve this. Working parents, subject to the level of their income, may receive support through the child care element of the working tax credit. We are also introducing greater incentives for employers to support parents with the cost of child care from April 2005.

Inland Revenue data on the child care costs of UK parents benefiting from the child care element of the working tax credit show that in April 2004 they had mean allowed weekly costs of £71.12[3]. As a result of this support, almost 318,000 working families in April 2004 were receiving an average of £49.66 per week towards their childcare costs.

In addition, all 3 and 4-year-olds are now entitled to free, part-time early education which guarantees each of them up to six terms of high quality provision before they reach statutory school age. This reduces the amount of child care that parents of children of this age have to pay for. Government also provides financial support to child care providers to help with start-up costs and sustainability, which will further reduce the costs that must be borne by parents.

[1] Repeat Study of Parents' Demand for Childcare (2002), DfES. This is a nationally representative survey of the demand for child care among parents of children aged 14 and under in England. Interviews were achieved in 5,416 households and the survey was carried out between February and July 2001.

[2] 'Families and Children in Britain: Findings from the 2002 Families and Children Study' (2004). Research Report 206 DWP.

[3] The figures on which this average is based are capped—i.e. parents who have costs above the £135/200 limits are assumed to have costs of £135/200 exactly (uncapped figures are not currently available).

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimate the Government has made of how many registered child care places there were in (a) Greater London and (b) each London borough in each year since 1997. [189475]

Margaret Hodge: The information is not readily available in the form requested. I will write to the hon. Member when the information is at hand and will place a copy in the Library. The figures will be available by mid-October.

Children Bill

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimate he has made of the cost of implementation of the Children Bill to (a) central Government and (b) local government. [189464]

Margaret Hodge: The Government produced an updated Regulatory Impact Assessment for the Children Bill on introduction in the Commons. This includes information on costs. A copy has been placed in the Library. Many of the measures in the Bill are about better and more effective ways of working and, in themselves, will not have any significant additional cost implications. However the Government will increase investment in children's services by almost £1 billion by 2007–08 compared with 2004–05. This will be used to start taking forward the reforms set out in Every Child Matters.

The Children's Commissioner is a new post. We will spend broadly £2.5 million a year on the Commissioner's Office (including on his functions). We estimate that this year the start up costs will be in the order of £100,000, including costs of recruiting.

The provisions for an information database and, if the Government were to decide to introduce one, a registration scheme for private fostering will clearly have cost implications. The extent of the costs will depend on how they are implemented. We will produce separate impact assessments and costing for these to go with the affirmative resolution regulations that would put the detail of implementation into legislation

Class Sizes

Brian Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the average class size was in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools in (i) England and (ii) the North Somerset Local Education Authority in each year since 1997. [188660]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: The requested information is given in the table.

Criminal Records (Local Authority Staff)

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) what his policy is on local authorities employing (a) social workers and (b) others working with children who have criminal records; [188922]

(2) what guidance he has issued to social services departments regarding the employment of people after a Criminal Records Bureau check has revealed a conviction; [188923]

(3) what discussions he has had with Haringey Social Services Department about the employment of people with criminal records. [188924]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 14 September 2004]: The Secretary of State has not discussed the employment of people with criminal records with Haringey Social Services Department.

It is for all employers to reach their own judgments about a person's suitability to work with children and other vulnerable people taking account of the legal requirements and all the information available including, where appropriate, information from the Criminal Records Bureau. Where an individual has been found guilty of an offence against a child, the court will consider whether, under the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000, the individual should be disqualified from working with children. Where an employer is notified that an individual has been disqualified by a court as a result of their conviction, the employer will be committing an offence if they employ the individual in a post working with children. Where any other conviction information is revealed, employers will naturally need to consider a number of issues including the nature and age of the conviction and its relevance to the post being applied for.

Dyslexia

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what guidance is in place to facilitate provision for dyslexic schoolchildren and students; and if he will make a statement on the implications for this provision of the introduction of disability legislation. [189096]

Margaret Hodge: Guidance on identifying and assessing special educational needs, including specific learning difficulties, such as dyslexia, is given in the SEN Code of Practice, to which schools and local education authorities must have regard. A range of material for teachers on dyslexia and dyscalculia has also been produced as part of the National Literacy and Numeracy Strategies to help promote inclusion of pupils with specific learning difficulties. The guidance has been well received and other material is in preparation.

The Department continues to work closely with both the British Dyslexia Association and the Dyslexia Institute to help raise awareness and develop new resources that will be of practical assistance to teachers and other staff. For example, we have supported the production and dissemination of a dyslexia friendly schools pack and a handy hints poster for primary schools.

It is envisaged the provision of such materials and guidance will help schools meet their statutory duties under the Disability Discrimination Act (DDA) 1995 where pupils with dyslexia meet the DDA definition of having a disability.

"Bridging the gap: a guide to the Disabled Students Allowances (DSAs) in higher education" is a publication providing detailed information for students on DSA grants which are available to higher education students with a disability or a specific learning difficulty such as dyslexia. The Department also has a dedicated webpage on our student support website for students with disabilities and learning difficulties. Further information is provided in our guide "Financial Support for Higher Education Students", a copy of which is sent to every student applying for student support.

The Department offers local education authorities strategic direction on policy and detailed guidance on the Statutory Instruments under which DSAs are paid.

Extended Schools Scheme

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what new money is being allocated to extended school day programmes that are part of the extended schools scheme. [189521]

Margaret Hodge: The Government are committed to supporting the development of extended schools. We have already invested around £45 million in the current Spending Review period to support the development of extended services in schools which includes the development of before and after school child care, out of schools clubs, breakfast clubs and other similar programmes.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills' statement to the House on 16 September set out how the additional funding for education and children's services over the period 2005–06 to 2007–08 will support the reforms set out in our Five Year Strategy for Children and Learners. Extended schools are a key part of the strategy. However, as the strategy makes clear, we are committed to reducing the burdens on the front line, including reducing the number of different funding streams so to give local authorities, schools and other agencies more scope to use resources flexibly to meet local needs. It is not, therefore, possible at this stage to give a figure for the increased investment in extended schools.

Fathers Direct

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what funding has been given to Fathers Direct in each year since 1997 by his Department and its predecessors with responsibility for children. [189323]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 16 September 2004]: Records show that funding given to Fathers Direct since 1997 by the Department for Education and Skills and its predecessors with responsibility for children is as follows:

Under the Family support grant:

£50,000 in 1999–2000, £100,000 in 2000–01, £100,000 in 2001–02; £50,000 in 2002–03; £50,000 in 2003–04 and £50,000 in 2004–05 (£25,000 given to date, £25,000 remaining to be paid)

Under the Parenting Fund:

£117,000 in 2003–04 Under Section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968: an award of £60,000 over two years commencing in 2003–04 (£30,000 given to date, £30,000 remaining to be paid)

Under the Parental Involvement in Children's Education Grant:

£19,000 in 2003–04, and £11,000 in 2004–05 (£7,000 given to date, £4,000 remaining to be paid) All figures rounded to the nearest £1,000.

The main activities of Fathers Direct include training, information and consultancy work for family services, prisons and schools on how to engage and work with fathers and advising Government on policy. Recent activity funded by DfES includes a project to provide information, skills and resources for supporting fathers' relationships with their children to those sectors that provide support to parents (funded under the Parenting Fund).

Foster Care

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many registered foster carers there were in each of the last three years. [189449]

Margaret Hodge: The information requested is not collected centrally. However, my Department is currently seeking to identify and resolve data collection difficulties so that we can work towards the collection of this information in future years.

The number of children looked after at 31 March in foster placements for each of the last three years is shown in the table.

2002	39,200
2003	41.100

Children Looked After by Local Authorities, Year Ending 31 March 2003

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimate he has made of the number of foster carers required to satisfy current demand. [189450]

Margaret Hodge: At 31 March 2003 there were an estimated 41,100 children in foster placements in England, representing 68 per cent. of all looked after children. The Department itself does not collect information centrally about the number of foster carers. However, a recent survey of local authorities, carried out by the Fostering Network, indicated a shortage of around 8,200 foster carers in England, inevitably limiting the range of placements available to looked after children. Assisting local authorities to recruit and retain foster carers is a key priority for my Department and a number of national initiatives are already in place or planned to encourage greater numbers of people to become and remain foster carers.

Further and Higher Education

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how much he plans to spend on (a) higher education and (b) further education in each of the three years covered by the recent Spending Review. [190083]

We are doing further work in partnership with the funding councils on the details of our spending plans for Further and Higher Education. Details of the grant letters to the Learning and Skills Council and the Higher Education Funding Council for England will be published at the time of release.

Mr. Ivan Lewis: This is a matter for the Learning and Skills Council. Mark Haysom, the Council's Chief Executive, will write to the hon. Member with this information and a copy of his reply will be placed in the House Library.

Pre-school Education

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many and what percentage of children had access to pre-school education in (a) St. Helens and (b) England, broken down by region, in each year since 1997. [186800]

Margaret Hodge: The information is not available in the form requested.

Provisional figures for 2004 show that all three and four-year-olds in England took up some form of early years education. 97 per cent. of these children received funding.

The available sub-national information relates the number of free part-time nursery education places taken up by three and four-year-olds. The latest figures for the St. Helens local authority area and the Government Office regions for 2003 are shown in the table. Provisional figures for 2004 show that in England, there were 1,034,900 free nursery education places taken up by 3 and 4-year-olds (or 91 places per 100 children).

Number of free nursery education places[1, 2] taken up by 3 and 4-year-old children in maintained nursery and primary schools and private, voluntary and independent providers in St. Helens local education authority area and by Government Office Region—Position in January each year: England 1997–2003

[1] Part-time equivalent number of free nursery education places taken up by three and four-year-old children.

[2] A free nursery education place comprises five two-and-a-half-hour sessions of early years education per week, for 33 weeks of the year, usually three terms of 11 weeks. Children in maintained schools are counted as taking up one place.

The latest provisional national figures on provision for three and four-year-olds were published in a Statistical Release "Provision for children under five years of age in England—January 2004" which is available on the Department's website www.dfes.gov.uk/rsgateway. The Department is planning to publish final figures for 2004 in October.

Pupil Referral and Learning Support Units

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the (a) pupil referral units and (b) learning support units operating in Buckinghamshire; and how many (i) staff and (ii) places there are in each. [189961]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: The January 2004 school census recorded five registered Pupil Referral Units (PRU), Aylesbury Vale PRU, Aylesbury Vale Secondary Support Centre, The Oaks PRU, The Wycombe Grange PRU and Woodlands Primary Support Centre, with a combined total of 190 pupils on roll (78 being solely registered with a PRU and the remaining 112 being dual-registered with a mainstream school), with 24 full-time equivalent teachers. Buckinghamshire has four Learning Support Units (LSU), Kirkstart LSU at Buckingham School, the Topaz Unit at Quarrendon School, The Diamond Centre at The Grange School and a LSU at Highcrest School. The Department does not hold any data on staff or place numbers for LSUs.

Research Council Funding

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills in what circumstances foreign students would be eligible for Research Council grants to permit them to continue their studies. [188403]

Ms Hewitt: I have been asked to reply.

Eligibility for Research Council studentship awards is set out in the Statutory Instrument 1997 No. 1972, The Education (Fees and Awards) Regulations 1997. In accordance with European Directives, EU nationals residing outside the UK are entitled to the same support as UK residents for their tuition fees and this is provided for in the regulations. The Statutory Instrument permits the Research Councils (and a number of other bodies) to offer UK residents full support for postgraduate studies (university fees and maintenance award), while restricting the eligibility of residents of the EEA to a tuition fees only award; residents of third countries are not entitled to receive any support. Foreign students that are settled in the UK within the meaning of the Immigration Act, have refugee status, or have been granted leave to remain are treated as UK residents in respect of the Instrument.

Special Educational Needs

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the average time taken to produce a statement of special educational needs is. [189361]

Margaret Hodge: Statutory timescales for local education authorities to observe in making assessments and statements of special educational needs are set out in the Special Educational Needs Code of Practice. Local education authorities are required to publish details of the percentage of draft statements they issue within the statutory 18-week timescale. There is also a statutory timescale of 26 weeks for local education authorities to produce final statements. Data are not collected or published on the percentage of final statements completed within this timescale.

In 2002/03, on average local education authorities in England met the 18-week timescale for producing draft statements in 65 per cent. of cases. When account is taken of cases where the issuing of draft statements was held up by factors beyond the authorities' control, this figure rose to 87 per cent.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many special needs status (a) primary and (b) secondary school children there were (i) in England and (ii) in the Buckingham constituency in (A) 2002–03 and (B) 2003–04. [189843]

Margaret Hodge: The requested information is given in the following table.

Maintained primary and secondary schools[1] number of pupils with special educational needs (SEN), Position in January each year 2003 and 2004

Sure Start

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the performance indicators and outcomes set for Sure-Start (a) in England and (b) on the Isle of Wight in each year since the programme's establishment. [189322]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 16 September 2004]: The Public Service Agreement (PSA) targets for Sure Start since the Spending Review 2000 (SR2000) are set out as follows. No targets have been set centrally for the Isle of Wight.

(a) SR2000 (covering the period from 2001 to 2004)

PSA1—Reduce the proportion of children aged 0–3 in the 500 Sure Start areas who are re-registered within the space of 12 months on the child protection register by 20 per cent. by 2004.

PSA2—Achieve by 2004 in the 500 Sure Start areas, a 10 per cent. reduction in mothers who smoke in pregnancy.

PSA3—Achieve by 2004 for children aged 0–3 in the 500 Sure Start areas, a reduction of five percentage points in the number of children with speech and language problems requiring specialist intervention by the age of four.

PSA4—Reduce the number of 0–3 year old children in Sure Start areas living in households where no one is working by 2004.

(b) SR2002 (covering the period from 2003 to 2006)

PSA1—In fully operational programmes, achieve by 2005–06 a [x][1] per cent increase in the proportion of babies and young children aged 0–5 with normal levels of personal, social and emotional development for their age.

PSA2—In fully operational programmes, achieve by 2005–06 a 6 percentage point reduction in the proportion of mothers who continue to smoke during pregnancy.

PSA3—In fully operational programmes, achieve by 2005–06 a [x][1] per cent increase in the proportion of children having normal levels of communication, language and literacy at the end of the Foundation Stage and an increase in the proportion of young children with satisfactory speech and language development at age two years

PSA4—In fully operational programmes, to achieve by 2005–06 a 12 per cent. reduction in the proportion of young children (aged 0–4) living in households where no one is working.

(c) SR 2004 (covering the period from 2005 to 2008)

PSA1—Improve children's communication, social and emotional development so that by 2008 50 per cent. of children reach a good level of development at the end of the Foundation Stage, and reduce inequalities between the level of development achieved by children in the 20 per cent. most disadvantaged areas and the rest of England.

PSA2—As a contribution to reducing the proportion of children living in households where no one is working, by 2008:

- i. increase the stock of Ofsted-registered childcare by 10 per cent.;
- ii. increase the take up of formal childcare by lower income working families by 50 per cent.;
- iii. introduce, by April 2005, a successful light-touch child care approval scheme

[1] Actual target levels for SR2002 PSAs 1 and 3 will be set when fuller results from the Foundation Stage Profile are available.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the Sure Start programmes in Buckinghamshire. [189852]

Margaret Hodge: There is one Sure Start programme in Buckinghamshire, Sure Start Wycombe. The programme was initially a Sure Start mini local programme and became a fully-fledged programme in June 2003. The programme covers three wards: North Oakridge, Central Castlefield and South Booker and provides Sure Start services to 825 children under four and their families in the catchment area.

Young People Green Paper

Charles Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when he plans to publish the Green Paper on young people provisionally entitled Things to Do and Places to Go; what proposals are likely to be included; and who will be consulted. [189826]

Margaret Hodge: We intend to publish the Youth Green Paper in December. The paper will set out a new offer for young people covering things to do and places to go; personal advice and support, particularly for young people at risk of poor outcomes; support for parents and families; opportunities for volunteering and mentoring; and the chance for young people to have more of a say.

In developing the paper, we are currently consulting other Government Departments and a wide range of key stakeholders including representatives from Local Government, schools, Connexions, the voluntary and community sectors, the private sector and young people and parents. In addition, the Green Paper will itself be a consultative document, on which we will be seeking comments from a very wide range of people.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Colombia

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his answer of 18 May 2004, Official Report, column 872W, on Colombia, if he will list the two unofficial statistics on the number of internally displaced people in Colombia in the last three years assessed by his Department to be the most accurate; and if he will make a statement. [175500]

Mr. Rammell: I would like to apologise to the hon. Member for the late reply to his question.

In my reply I alluded to the difficulty in establishing totally accurate statistics of internally displaced people (IDPs) in Colombia. In gauging the extent of the problem we compare figures provided by the Colombian Government with those provided by reputable Colombian NGOs, including Consultoria Para Los Derechos Humanos Y El Desplazamiento (CODHES) or Consultancy for Human Rights and Displacement in English. This comparison enables us to monitor trends in IDP figures, increasing or decreasing, and helps in our efforts to establish the reason for such changes. The CODHES figures for 2001 were 341,925 (Colombian Government figure is 327,606) and in 2002 were 412,553 (Colombian Government figure is 379,289). However it would not be reasonable to expect that either set of figures were 100 per cent. accurate.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his answer of 18 May 2004, Official Report, column 872W, on Colombia, what steps (a) his Department took, (b) his Department initiated and (c) were taken by non-governmental organisations to assess the veracity of the Government statistics showing a marked decline in internally displaced people in Colombia in 2003; and if he will make a statement. [175501]

Mr. Rammell: In my reply I alluded to the difficulty in establishing totally accurate figures of internally displaced people (IDPs) in Colombia. To do so we compare figures of IDPs from different, respected sources and thereby try to gauge trends. We supplement the assessment of such data by our Embassy in Bogota seeking to establish the true picture through discussions with the Government of Colombia, NGOs, international organisations working in Colombia such as the UN, ICRC, the church and civil society. The respected Norwegian Refugee Council is one of these interlocutors. Embassy officials also travel around the country to assess the situation at first hand, although such travel can be restricted by security concerns. There is no guaranteed, comprehensive means of checking the accuracy of figures of IDPs. The marked decline in numbers of IDPs in 2003 referred to new displacements in that year.

Departmental Staff (Upper Age Limits)

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether (a) his Department and (b) agencies for which it is responsible (i) have a set retirement age which applies to all or most personnel and (ii) have a maximum age beyond which applications for employment will not be considered; and what the age is in each case. [186085]

Mr. Alexander: In the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) all officers have a set retirement age of 60 years. However, if band A (clerical) officers wish to postpone their retirement they may do so up to 65 years and band B (junior management), band C (middle management) and band D (senior management) may do so up to 63 years.

Members of the Diplomatic Service are recruited up to 52 years to allow time for training and tours of duty at home and abroad before retirement. Members of the FCO Home Civil Service cadre are recruited up to 57 years to allow time for a normal tour of duty in a home job before retirement.

The FCO is not responsible for any agencies.

EU-Israel Association Agreement

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Government will call for the suspension of the EU-Israel Association Agreement on the basis of the International Court of Justice ruling of 9 July. [185779]

Mr. MacShane: No.

EU-US Trade

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the percentage change in EU trade with the US has been since 1 May. [186648]

Mr. Alexander: The value of trade in goods between the EU25 and the US rose by 10 per cent. between May and July 2004 compared to the same three months in 2003.

Source:

US Bureau of Economic Affairs, balance of payments September news release, exports and imports of goods by selected countries, not seasonally adjusted.

Human Rights (China)

Tom Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Chinese authorities with regard to observance of basic human rights in China. [175151]

Mr. Rammell: I would like to apologise to my hon. Friend for the late reply to his question.

Both my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary raised our serious concerns about human rights issues in China during their respective meetings with the Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao and the Chinese Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing on 10 May. I also recently raised the issue of human rights with Vice Foreign Minister Zhang Yesui during my visit to China in July.

In addition, I also raised our concerns with Chinese delegates at the biannual UK/China Human Rights Dialogue, the latest round of which took place in London on 13 and 14 May. We raised a range of issues including freedom of expression, minority rights, freedom of religion, as well as concerns about torture and the use of the death penalty.

Iraq

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many child prisoners are held in Iraqi prisons under the control of Coalition forces. [183957]

Mr. Rammell: The UK is not detaining any security internees under the age of 18.

The US is the Detaining Power for 55 security internees under the age of 18. For updated information on US detainees visit www.iac-baghdad.org.

Sir Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment the Government have made of the feasibility of opening a consulate in Erbil, Iraq; and if he will make a statement. [189368]

Mr. Straw: Her Majesty's Government are represented in northern Iraq by the office of the British embassy in Kirkuk. This decision was based on a number of factors, including security advice. Although there are no current plans to open a consulate in Erbil the consul general is already travelling extensively around northern Iraq and maintaining the excellent links we have developed in this area.

I visited Kirkuk, Lake Dokan and Erbil on 5 October.

Iraqi Airways

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the coalition was consulted on the recent sale of 75 per cent. of Iraqi Airways to an Iraqi family; and if he will make a statement. [188929]

Mr. Rammell [holding answer 16 September 2004]: This is a matter for the Iraq Interim Government. However the Director of Iraqi Airways has confirmed that Iraqi Airways remains 100 per cent. in the control of the Ministry of Transport.

People Trafficking

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list (a) the key countries of origin and (b) the key countries of transit for the illegal trafficking of (i) children under the age of 14 and (ii) women. [183592]

Mr. Rammell: We are committed to doing all we can to combat human trafficking. I refer the hon. Member to the statement I made on 15 September 2004, Official Report, columns 490–95WH in an adjournment debate on the international trafficking of women which sets out the actions we are taking.

Human trafficking is a global crime, involving many source and transit countries. Some countries are both source and transit countries. Traffickers are flexible and, as circumstances change, seek new markets and routes. In its "Trafficking of Human Beings—a Europol Perspective—January 2004", Europol provides an overview of the issue. A copy of this report is available on Europol's website: www.europol.eu.int. Through our network of immigration liaison officers in Europe, we work closely with our European partners to combat human trafficking. The "UK Threat Assessment of Serious and Organised Crime 2003" available on NCIS's website, www.ncis.co.uk, also gives details of the pattern of movement of illegal migrants.

The nature of trafficking means that it is a hidden crime and there are no reliable figures about children under the age of 14 or women being trafficked into or out of Europe.

Royal Family (Overseas Visits)

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty the Queen plans to visit (a) Singapore and (b) New Zealand within the next five years. [186893]

Mr. Mullin: The forward programme of visits by Her Majesty the Queen for the next five years has not been finalised. For security reasons Royal Visits overseas are not generally announced until a few months before a visit takes place.

Sudan

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to submit a resolution to the United Nations Security Council (UNSC) to implement a comprehensive arms embargo on Sudan in addition to the measures established in UNSC resolution 1556. [189757]

Mr. Mullin: The Security Council is currently discussing the Secretary-General's latest report on Darfur, and, as a member of the Security Council, the UK will consider in due course what, if any, further measures need to be taken against the Government of Sudan.

The UK has strictly enforced an EU arms embargo on Sudan since it was imposed in 1994.

Terrorism

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress is being made in (a) breaking the global network of al-Qaeda and (b) the search for Osama Bin Laden. [186774]

Mr. MacShane: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave him on 16 July 2004, Official Report, column 1380W. We continuously assess the threat from al-Qaeda and al-Qaeda related terrorist cells, including their numbers and locations. But for reasons, which the hon. Member will understand, we do not publish these assessments. The Security and Intelligence Agencies are outside the scope of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information (Paragraph 6, Part I).

The hunt for Osama Bin Laden continues. All coalition forces and indigenous police authorities are actively searching for his whereabouts.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Local Service Delivery

12. Mr. Weir: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how he assesses the efficiency of service delivery in local offices. [190402]

Jane Kennedy: The Department's local office network is delivered through Jobcentre Plus. DWP has a Public Service Agreement (PSA) target to improve the delivery of services of each of its businesses, including Jobcentre Plus, by setting published annual targets addressing accuracy, unit costs and customer service. We also set Jobcentre Plus other targets covering key aspects of its business—job outcomes, reducing losses through fraud and error, delivery of key business processes and employer outcomes. These targets are announced annually in Parliament and in Jobcentre Plus's business plan. Progress is monitored regularly and is published in the Department's Annual Report.

Financial Assistance Scheme

13. Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions when ASW workers whose occupational pensions are in administration can expect to receive their first payment from the recently announced Financial Assistance Scheme. [190403]

Malcolm Wicks: By the spring of 2005 we intend to have the legislative framework in place with a view to being able to make the first payments as quickly as possible thereafter.

Meanwhile we are continuing to work on the design of the Scheme in consultation with stakeholders. Until that work has been completed we cannot give any particular scheme's members' assurances that they will be covered.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Works and Pensions pursuant to his answer of 5 July 2004, Official Report, column 546, on pension protection, how much has been paid out under the pension assistance package of 30 June. [190390]

Mr. Swire: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, if he will make a statement on the Government's Financial Assistance Scheme. [190392]

Mr. Pond: The Financial Assistance Scheme will give support to those who face the most significant losses of their pension when their employer has become insolvent. Details of the Scheme's operation are being worked out as quickly as possible, in consultation with stakeholders. No payments have yet been made from the Scheme.

23. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, what discussions he has had with the pensions industry regarding the Financial Assistance Scheme. [190413]

Malcolm Wicks: Ministers from the Department for Work and Pensions have held many meetings with representatives from the pensions industry, including those that my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), the former Secretary of State, had with Confederation of British Industry (CBI), the Institute of Actuaries, the National Association of Pension Funds (NAPF), the Trades Union Congress (TUC), Amicus the Union, and Community.

Disability Living Allowance

15. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many and what percentage of appeals against the disallowance of disability living allowance were successful in (a) 2001, (b) 2002 and (c) 2003. [190405]

Maria Eagle: The numbers of disability living allowance appeals cleared at hearing for the periods requested are set out as follows.

Disability living allowance appeals, received at the Appeals Service, cleared at hearing and in favour of appellant, for each calendar year 2001–03

	Lodged	Received	Cleared at hearing	Cleared in favour	Percentage cleared in favour
2001	86,440	87,245	86,280	45,165	52.3
2002	82,490	82,630	72,815	39,495	54.2
2003	87,340	83,665	69,865	36,850	52.7

Notes:

1. All figures are subject to change as more up-to-date data becomes available.
2. Figures for the latest months may rise significantly as information feeds through to the Appeals Service.
3. Figures are rounded to the nearest five.
4. Figures may not sum due to rounding.
5. Percentages are to one decimal place and are based on unrounded figures
6. Figures include the results of all appeals. The figures for successful appeals against disallowance only are not available.

Minimum Income Guarantee

16. Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what proportion of pensioners entitled to the minimum income guarantee were in receipt of it at the latest date for which figures are available. [190406]

Malcolm Wicks: Last October minimum income guarantee was replaced by pension credit, a less intrusive, more generous entitlement. As at 31 August, over two million pensioner households were receiving the guarantee element, getting money to the poorest pensioners. This includes 260,000 more households that have been receiving financial assistance that they did not get under the minimum income guarantee.

Final Salary Pension Schemes

17. Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will make a statement on the number of people participating in final salary pension schemes. [190407]

Malcolm Wicks: We estimate that in total there are around 22 million individual entitlements to benefits in UK defined benefit pension schemes. The number of people participating will be slightly lower than this, as individuals can be members of more than one scheme.

Benefit-Tax Credit Interaction

18. Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what assessment he has made of the interaction of benefits and tax credits. [190408]

Mr. Pond: We are determined to make work pay and to tackle the traps of unemployment and poverty; tax credits are at the heart of this strategy. Over 6 million hard working families are already benefiting from tax credits and over half of all children in the UK are benefiting from the increase in child tax credit.

DWP and the Inland Revenue will keep working with local authorities to ensure that tax credits, housing benefit and council tax benefit work together and continue to make it easier than ever before to move into work.

School Crossing Patrol Officers

19. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will extend the higher level of earnings disregard to benefit claims from school crossing patrol officers. [190409]

Mr. Pond: All aspects of benefit payment, including disregards, are kept under constant review in order to ensure the fair and equitable distribution of benefit and the best use of public funds.

I want to pay tribute to my hon. Friend for his vigorous campaigning on this issue, but he knows that this is a complex matter with wider implications and I cannot promise that we will be able to act in the way that he would wish.

Pensions Commission

20. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, when he expects the Pensions Commission to report. [190410]

Malcolm Wicks: The Pensions Commission has announced that it will publish its first report tomorrow. This will be a thorough analysis of the UK Pensions System. I welcome the work of this independent Commission which we established to keep under review the regime for UK private pensions and long-term savings. I look forward to its findings.

Incapacity Benefit

22. Ann McKechin: To ask the Secretary of State for Works and Pensions, if he will make a statement on incapacity benefit. [190412]

Maria Eagle: As we have already said, this Government are determined to do more to address the legacy of inactivity.

Between 1979 and 1997 the number of people receiving Incapacity Benefit trebled and had that trend continued there would be around four million people now on Incapacity Benefit instead of 2.7 million.

Almost all of those who move on to incapacity benefits want and expect to go back to work. Our reforms will give them the opportunity and full range of help needed to realise that goal.

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what factors contribute to delays to the reinstatement of attendance allowance, where that allowance has been suspended following a stay in hospital. [190028]

Maria Eagle: A number of factors can contribute to delays to the reinstatement of attendance allowance where that allowance has been suspended following a stay in hospital. These can include the need to contact the customer or obtain medical evidence in order to determine the impact on benefit entitlement of any change in the customer's condition. In some cases there is a need to obtain information from other sources such as a hospital, local authority or residential care home. There will also be a need to liaise with other parts of the Department where payment of attendance allowance is combined with other Social Security benefits. Staff are advised that where there are other matters to consider, priority should be given to re-instating benefit prior to making any further inquiries wherever possible.

Benefit Calculation

Tony Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will disregard borough councillor allowances as income for the purposes of benefit calculation. [190100]

Mr. Pond: The basic councillor allowance is payable to all councillors for the time they devote to their work and to cover costs for which no other specific payment is made. For those people in receipt of income related benefits, such as income support, income based jobseeker's allowance and pension credit, which are intended to help people whose resources are insufficient to meet their day-to-day living expenses; this is treated in the same way as other types of earnings and attracts the normal £5 or £20 earnings disregard. However, expenses are fully disregarded where the expenses were incurred wholly, exclusively and necessarily in the performance of the councillor's duties.

For those in receipt of incapacity benefit, which is normally paid to people who are incapacitated by the effects of their illness or disability, there is an exception for local authority councillors. Incapacity benefit is not normally payable to people who work and receive an income, however, the special provision for councillors recognises the particular obligations placed on elected councillors by disregarding such work for the purposes of deciding entitlement to benefit. Account is taken of the amount of allowance payable but benefit is affected only if the allowance exceeds the prescribed limit of £78 in any week. In this event, benefit is reduced on a pound-for-pound basis by the amount that the allowance exceeds the limit.

We have no plans to change the way in which these allowances are treated.

Bereaved Parents Allowance

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many appeals against non-allowance of the bereaved parents allowance there have been in each of the last three years; and how many were successful. [188404]

Maria Eagle: This is a matter for Christina Townsend, Chief Executive of the Appeals Service. She will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Christina Townsend to Mr David Drew, dated 6 October 2004:

The Secretary of State has asked me to respond to your question regarding the number of appeals against non-allowance of the bereaved parents allowance there have been in each of the last three years; and how many were successful.

The information is not available in the format you have requested as figures for all Widows/Bereavement benefits are recorded together. However, the information in table 1 gives details of all Widows/Bereavement benefit claims in payment. Table 2 gives details of all Widows/Bereavement benefit appeals received in each of the last three years and the number of those appeals that were successful.

Exceptions Service

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions when the Exceptions Service is expected to be set up for those who cannot be part of the Government's new pensions payments arrangements. [189898]

Mr. Pond: Cheque payments (previously referred to as the Exceptions Service) will be phased in over the period from October 2004 to March 2005.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many complaints he has received from pensioners who have asked to use the Exceptions Service and have been referred to other options with regard to pensioner's payments. [189899]

Mr. Pond: Independent research commissioned by DWP shows that there are very high levels of satisfaction among benefit and pensions customers who have transferred to direct payment and those who have started claiming and chose to receive direct payments. Overall 91 per cent. of customers were happy with the process of setting up direct payments (the figure for pensioners was 88 per cent.). Similarly, overall 93 per cent. of customers were happy with the process of having payments made into an account (the figure for pensioners was 92 per cent.).

Direct payment is now the normal method of payment. The Department provides staff with the factual information they need to give to customers, in order for customers themselves to choose the account which best meets their needs and circumstances. The cheque payment is only intended for those customers who we cannot pay by direct payment; it is not an alternative payment option.

We are continuing to contact existing customers to invite them to provide account details. Customers who advise the Department that they are unable to open or manage an account will be paid by cheque payment. We do not capture data concerning the number of complaints received from pensioners who have asked to use cheque payment and have been referred to other options.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will publish the figures, by constituency up to the last date for which figures are known, for (a) those who have been contacted about the new pensions payment arrangements, (b) those who have agreed to new arrangements of payment method, (c) those who have asked about the Exceptions Service and (d) those who have yet to reply. [189900]

Mr. Pond: Information is not available in the constituency-based format requested. However as at 10 July 2004 for the Constituency of Stroud 19,600 (61.9 per cent.) of all benefit accounts were paid by direct payment into bank accounts, and 1,185 (3.7 per cent.), into Post Office card accounts.

The move to direct payment is progressing well. 14.25 million customers are to be moved to direct payment, of which approximately 50 per cent. are over pension age. To date over 5.3 million pensioners have been contacted.

Of the pensioners contacted nearly 4.4 million have responded by either supplying their bank details or requesting a Post Office card account.

We do not capture data on the number of customers who have asked about cheque payments. The cheque payment is only intended for those customers who we cannot pay by direct payment; it is not an alternative payment option. Customers will not apply to be paid in this way.

With regard to the pensions customers who have not yet responded—there will always be a time lag between the total number of invitations issued and the number of people that have so far responded.

Key figures on the progress of conversion to direct payment are available in the Library. These figures are updated every four weeks.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will list the 20 councils with the longest times for processing new housing benefit claims, identifying in each case the average time for processing claims. [185706]

Mr. Pond [pursuant to his reply, 22 July 2004, Official Report, c. 441W]:

Industrial Injuries Benefits

Stephen Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many people claimed industrial injuries disablement benefit for occupational asthma in (a) the UK and (b) England in each of the last five years. [189868]

Maria Eagle: The information is in the table.

Jobcentre Plus

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (1) how many redundancies he expects from the closure of Jobcentre Plus, Victoria Avenue, Southend-on-Sea; and if he will make a statement; [190033]

(2) what representations his Department has received on the closure of Jobcentre Plus, Victoria Avenue, Southend-on-Sea; and if he will make a statement; [190034]

(3) what plans there are to deploy those affected by the closure of Jobcentre Plus, Victoria Avenue, Southend-on-Sea to other areas within his Department; and if he will make a statement; [190035]

(4) what factors underlay the decision to close Jobcentre Plus, Victoria Avenue, Southend-on-Sea; and if he will make a statement. [190036]

Jane Kennedy: The administration of Jobcentre Plus is a matter for the Chief Executive of Jobcentre Plus, David Anderson. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from David Anderson to Mr. David Amess, dated 11 October 2004:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your questions regarding the announcements made on the closure of the Victoria Avenue Jobcentre Plus site in Southend-on-Sea. This is something that falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of Jobcentre Plus.

It is too early to say whether there will be any redundancies arising from this closure. The Department's aim is to redeploy as many staff as possible into other jobs within Jobcentre Plus, particularly in Great Oaks House, Basildon, which will be requiring additional benefit processing staff and is within daily travelling distance from Southend. We will also be looking at redeployment opportunities in other parts of this and other Government departments. Following this redeployment exercise we will have a clearer picture of whether redundancies might be necessary, and the numbers affected.

The District Manager for Essex has written to our partners and external stakeholders to inform them of the announcement. No representations have been made so far concerning the closure of the Victoria Avenue site.

In deciding to close Victoria House, a number of factors were taken into account, including how best to use the space available to us, and the staff expertise available to do the work. For benefit processing centres, we are looking at sites capable of accommodating 250 to 600 staff, and Victoria House is not large enough for this. Furthermore, under our contract with our estate partner Land Securities Trillium, Victoria House can be released more quickly and thus more cheaply.

I am happy to assure you that the face to face customer service to the people of Southend will be maintained in our Jobcentre Plus outlet at Dencora Court, Southend.

Should you wish to meet with the District Manager for Essex to discuss this further he can be contacted at the Essex District Office in Chelmsford on 01245 545122.

Hywel Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what Welsh language services are provided by Jobcentre Plus Direct. [189959]

Jane Kennedy: The administration of Jobcentre Plus is a matter for the Chief Executive of Jobcentre Plus, David Anderson. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from David Anderson to Mr. Hywel Williams, dated 11 October 2004:

As Jobcentre Plus is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question concerning what Welsh language services are provided by Jobcentre Plus Direct. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

Jobcentre Plus Direct is the contact centre network for Jobcentre Plus customers who either wish to make a benefit claim or want to use our job brokering service—Jobseeker Direct.

In answer to your specific question, Jobcentre Plus Direct offers a dedicated telephone number to Welsh language speakers for both making claims to benefit and seeking help through Jobseeker Direct.

I hope this reply to your question is helpful.

Hywel Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what steps he is taking to safeguard Jobcentre Plus services delivered through the medium of Welsh during the closure and centralisation programme in Wales. [190011]

Jane Kennedy: The administration of Jobcentre Plus is a matter for the Chief Executive of Jobcentre Plus, David Anderson. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from David Anderson to Mr. Hywel Williams, dated 11 October 2004:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply direct to your question concerning the delivery of Jobcentre Plus services through the medium of Welsh. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of Jobcentre Plus.

As you may be aware, Jobcentre Plus is modernising the way in which it delivers its business. We are creating a modernised service in refurbished buildings and these enhancements are dramatically changing the way we help people of working age, giving a real work focus for customers claiming benefit.

We are establishing a Contact Centre in North West Wales which will provide a Welsh Language service to our customers who contact us by telephone or through other electronic channels. For those who wish, or need, to undertake their business with us on a face-to-face basis, we will have a network of offices and flexible delivery sites throughout Wales that will continue to ensure that Welsh speaking advisers will be available.

Jobcentre Plus has made a commitment, as outlined in its Annex to the Department's Welsh Language Scheme, that the English and Welsh Languages will be treated on a basis of equality. This commitment was underlined by the Department for Work and Pensions' Permanent Secretary, Sir Richard Mottram, who attended the launch of the Department's Scheme with the Welsh Language Board at this year's National Eisteddfod.

Jobcentre Plus will continue its longstanding commitment to encourage and support members of staff wishing to learn Welsh or improve their ability to speak Welsh in the workplace. Staff dealing with claims to benefit and those conducting advisory interviews are being offered Welsh Language training to enable them to deal with customers in the language of their choice.

I can assure you, therefore, that Jobcentre Plus is taking all the necessary steps it can to safeguard the services it provides to its customers through the medium of Welsh.

I hope that this is helpful in clarifying the position.

Pension Credit

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what his Department's latest estimate is of (a) the number of pensioners, (b) the number entitled to pension credit and (b) the number taking up pension credit in Leeds, West. [189948]

Malcolm Wicks: The number of people in receipt of state pension in Leeds, West was 14,500 (rounded to the nearest 100) on 30 September 2003, the latest date for which a figure is available. Information on the number of people likely to be eligible for pension credit is not available at constituency level. However, we estimate that approximately 400,000 households in the Yorkshire and Humberside region, corresponding to approximately 500,000 individuals (rounded to the nearest 50,000), are likely to be eligible for pension credit in 2004–05. Information on the number of pension credit recipients in Yorkshire and Humberside and Leeds, West is given in the table.

Pension credit recipients, 31 August 2004

	Households	Individuals
Yorkshire and Humberside	251,830	308,495
Leeds, West	4,435	5,275

Notes:

1. Figures are rounded to the nearest five.

2. Individual recipients include a small number of partners under age 60.

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans he has to change the provision of mortgage assistance under pension credit. [189726]

Malcolm Wicks: Currently customers have their benefit entitlement in respect of housing costs calculated using a standard interest rate. This is based on the average rates charged by the top 23 building societies and is currently 5.88 per cent.

We hope to lay legislation later this year that will revise the scheme for customers in receipt of pension credit, income support and income-based jobseeker's allowance. The revised legislation will replace the standard interest rate with a standard tracker rate that will use the Bank of England base rate as a baseline and abolish the current 5 per cent. de minimus rule.

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will estimate the number of (a) pensions and (b) pensioner households eligible for the pension credit, broken down by (i) guarantee credit and (ii) savings credit for (A) each year up to 2014 and (B) appropriate intervals up to 2034. [187349]

Malcolm Wicks: Estimates of future Pension Credit eligibility are not available as policy in relation to the structure and uprating of Pension Credit has only been determined up to the end of the current Parliament. Projections of eligibility consistent with the Spending Review expenditure plans, up to 2007/08, are shown in tables 1 and 2 below. These are on the assumption that current policies are maintained for 2006/07 and 2007/08, but this should not be taken to imply that a decision on future levels of payment has been taken. Forecasts will be updated following any further decisions on rates of payment.

Table 1: Projection of pensioners eligible for Pension Credit (individuals)

Year	Guarantee element only	Guarantee element and savings element	Savings element only	Pension Credit
2004–05	1,250,000	1,700,000	1,700,000	4,650,000
2005–06	1,150,000	1,850,000	1,800,000	4,800,000
2006–07	1,150,000	1,900,000	1,850,000	4,900,000
2007–08	1,150,000	1,950,000	2,050,000	5,150,000

Table 2: Projection of pensioners eligible for Pension Credit (households)

Year	Guarantee element only	Guarantee element and savings element	Savings element only	Pension Credit
2004–05	950,000	1,400,000	1,200,000	3,550,000
2005–06	850,000	1,500,000	1,250,000	3,650,000
2006–07	850,000	1,550,000	1,350,000	3,750,000
2007–08	850,000	1,600,000	1,450,000	3,900,000

Notes:

1. Projections with this breakdown are only available for private households. In addition to pensioners in private households, there are approximately 200,000 pensioners in care homes eligible for Pension Credit. The figures in Tables 1 and 2 above do not include pensioners in care homes.
2. Estimates for private households and individuals in 2004–05 are based on the Family Resources Survey data for 2002–03 projected forward to 2004–05 to reflect changes in taxes, benefit rates and pensioners' incomes.
3. For projections beyond 2004–05 it has been assumed that pensioners' incomes will rise in line with average earnings; the guarantee credit will be uprated in line with average earnings; and the savings credit threshold will be uprated in line with prices.
4. The numbers entitled under these assumptions have then been scaled up to reflect growth in the pensioner population, using projections from the Government Actuary's Department.
5. Projections have been rounded to the nearest 50,000 cases, are subject to a wide margin of error and should be used as broad indications of the likely eligible population only.
6. A pensioner household is defined as single persons aged 60 or over and couples where at least one partner is aged 60 or over. Individuals are single pensioners with eligibility and both partners in a couple with eligibility.
7. Rows might not sum exactly due to rounding.

Pension Payments

Richard Younger-Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many people suffered late payment of pensions in each of the last 12 (a) weeks and (b) months; what procedures are in place to resolve such delays; and what the average length of time taken to resolve these problems is. [188116]

Mr. Pond: Information is not available in the format required. There are a variety of reasons why payments may be delayed but customers who cannot access their funds, and are in hardship, can approach The Pension Service for an emergency payment.

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (1) whether UK state pensions paid to British citizens living in dependent territories, formerly domiciled in the UK, are increased in line with pensions in the UK; [190043]

(2) if he will list those countries where UK citizens living in retirement can obtain the UK state pension; and in which countries the pension is frozen at the figure when the citizen left the UK to live abroad; [190041]

(3) if he will introduce measures so that British citizens living in dependent territories and formerly domiciled in the UK can have their state retirement pension increased in line with pensions in the UK. [190030]

Malcolm Wicks: The UK state pension is payable in all countries abroad to those who are entitled to it but is only uprated for UK pensioners living overseas where there is a legal requirement or reciprocal social security agreement to do so.

It is uprated in countries within the European Economic Area[1] including Gibraltar[2] under the provisions of the EC Social Security legislation and the following countries with which the UK has reciprocal agreements: Barbados, Bermuda[2], the Channel Islands, Israel, Jamaica, Malta, Mauritius, the Philippines, Switzerland, Turkey, the USA and the now separate republics of the former Federal People's Republic of Yugoslavia (the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro); Bosnia-Herzegovina, Croatia, Slovenia and the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia). The state pension is not uprated in any other country and we have no plans to do so.

Notes:

[1] This includes Cyprus. Although the British sovereign base areas of Akrotiri and Dhekelia are British dependent territories and not part of the Republic of Cyprus, article 4(2) of the reciprocal agreement with Cyprus provides that if a person would be entitled to a UK state pension, it shall be payable to them while they are in Cyprus, including the sovereign base areas, as if they were in the UK.

Pensions Bill

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what progress has been made on the consultation on Clauses 35, 36, 39 and 40 of the Pensions Bill; and if he will make a statement. [189763]

Malcolm Wicks: Over the summer officials met with a wide cross-section of pensions industry and other representatives. They also received and reviewed a large number of written comments.

My noble Friend, the Baroness Hollis has said that she will be sharing a report detailing the consultation process and its findings with the members of the Grand Committee. This is expected in the next two weeks.

Post Office Card Accounts

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions pursuant to the answer of 27 February 2004, Official Report, column 604W, on direct payment, how many (a) Post Office card accounts and (b) bank or building society accounts have been requested for (i) state pension and pension credit and (ii) Jobcentre Plus payments; and if he will break down the number of accounts receiving payments (A) of state pension and pension credit and (B) payments from Jobcentre Plus by region. [162737]

Mr. Pond [holding answer 22 March 2004]: The information is not available in the format requested.

As at 15 August the total number of Post Office card accounts requested since 1 April 2003 was 3,255,010. (Source: Post Office Ltd. data). This figure includes customers in DWP, Social Security Agency Northern Ireland, the Veterans Agency and the Inland Revenue. These figures include persons who have claimed benefit and persons waiting for their current order book to expire before migrating to direct payment. Accounts are not designated to the particular Departments or agencies who pay into the Post Office card account.

A breakdown of accounts into specific agencies or Departments is not available. A customer is only allowed one Post Office card account into which several benefits can be paid.

We do not have figures for the number of applications to open bank and building society accounts. This information is confidential between the customer and their bank or building society.

The information provided in my earlier answer of 27 February 2004, Official Report, column 604W, was from data available as at 24 January 2004. We are unable to break this total down by region because there is a problem with the geographical allocations on the 24 January 2004 dataset. The latest date for which information relating to my Department is currently available, by region, into Post Office card accounts is 23 July 2004 and is shown in the following tables together with payments into bank or building society accounts.

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what percentage of successful applicants for the pension credit have elected to receive payments to Post Office Card Accounts to date. [155597]

Mr. Pond: The information is not available in the precise form requested. However, at 31 July the number of live Pension Credit accounts was 2,581,813, of which 364,090 or 14.1 per cent. were paid to a Post Office card account. Of the total, 941,715 were not previously receiving Minimum Income Guarantee. Of these cases, 66,780, or 7.1 per cent. were being paid to a Post Office card account.

School Crossing Patrol Officers

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will extend the higher level of earnings disregard to benefit claims from school crossing partol officers. [190409]

Mr. Pond: This is a complex matter with wider implications, however all aspects of benefit payment, including disregards, are kept under constant review in order to ensure the far and equitable distribution of benefit and the best use of public funds. [190409]

State Second Pension

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will estimate how many employees (a) contracted out of and (b) contracted into the second state pension in 2003–04, broken down by sex and age; and what information he gives older workers on contracting into the state second pension. [181947]

Malcolm Wicks [pursuant to his reply, 7 July 2004, Official Report, c. 764W]: The Department for Work and Pensions does not specifically provide information to older workers on contracting back into the State Second Pension. It does however publish information leaflets that contain guidance on both State and private pension provision. This guidance stresses how important it is that people regularly review their pension arrangements including decisions about whether to contract in or out, to make sure that they have the income that they need when they retire; and that they should consider taking independent advice if they feel it necessary to do so.

Estimates on the number of employees contracted out of and contracted into the State Earnings Related Pension Scheme (SERPS) in 2000–01 (the latest year for which the information is available) broken down by age and gender, are in the following table.

Thousand

	Number contracted out		Number with SERPS membership

Winter Fuel Payments

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans he has to change the way in which the winter fuel payments scheme is publicised to men aged between 60 and 64 years; and if he will make a statement. [189992]

Malcolm Wicks: There are currently no plans to change the way in which winter fuel payments are publicised to men aged 60–64.

We regularly carry out research to gauge awareness and knowledge of winter fuel payments, including awareness of the scheme among those aged 60–64, as part of the routine evaluation of the publicity campaign to inform people about winter fuel payment for each winter. Lessons learned from this evaluation are taken forward to refine future publicity activity.

Women's Pension Provision

Stephen Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what recent assessment he has made of women's pension provision; and if he will make a statement. [189690]

Malcolm Wicks: The Government recognise that the majority of pensioners are women and are committed to ensuring that pension reforms improve the position of women in retirement.

There are around 6.5 million women in Great Britain in receipt of a UK basic state pension—almost two-thirds of all recipients. Around half of these receive the full-rate basic state pension, compared to around 90 per cent. of men. The average amount of state retirement pension for women in Great Britain is £71.81, compared to £100.27 for men.[1]

Including income from private sources, the average gross weekly income for single female pensioners in 2002–03 was £197, compared to £221 for single male pensioners. Benefit income (including the state retirement pension, income-related benefits and disability related-benefits) made up almost two thirds of the gross incomes of single female pensioners in 2002–03, compared to a little over half of the gross incomes of single male pensioners.[2]

We have already introduced a range of policies that directly benefit women in four key areas:

helping women into employment through new deal, tax credits and a commitment to additional resources for child care so they can save and plan for their future;

helping lower paid women to save for their pensions through the state second pension and stakeholder pensions; helping existing pensioners through pension credit, improvements to the basic state pension and pensions sharing on divorce;

we are committed to improving pension information for everyone to ensure that they are aware of their pension position and their choices.

We will help those in short stay jobs build up pension rights by enabling people to take a cash equivalent transfer value of their pension rights to another scheme. This is particularly important for women who have more varied employment patterns.

Around 20 million people will gain from the state second pension, including 2.5 million carers—almost all of whom are women—and 5 million low earners—around 70 per cent. of whom are women.

As my hon. Friend may know, we have announced our intention to produce a report on the subject of women and pensions by the end of the 2005 calendar year. This will provide detailed analysis of pension provision for women. The DWP has commissioned a large-scale qualitative survey that will investigate the factors that affect women's individual savings decisions within the household, and the results will be published and made publicly available.

East Timor

Mr Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what support the Government are giving to East Timor; and if he will make a statement. [189949]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: Since 1999 the UK has committed over £30 million to East Timor. Between 2002 and 2005 DFID will contribute £12 million to help implement East Timor's National Development Plan. This will be channelled through a World Bank managed Trust Fund. A further £1.3 million is being provided over the same period, through Oxfam, to support community education. Britain has also contributed some 19 per cent. of European Commission development expenditure in East Timor. Between 1999 and 2002 (the last year for which figures are available) this is estimated to have been some £14 million.

GM Crops

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment he has made of (a) the advantages and (b) the disadvantages of genetically-modified crops to developing countries. [190095]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: DFID's approach to GM crops and developing countries is based on the principle that the health of people and the environment is of primary concern. GM technologies have the potential to provide significant benefits for poor farmers. For example, the potential for increased yields in developing countries from the use of GM technology far exceeds the potential in European and North American conventional agriculture, where yields have been high for many years. GM technology could also improve the nutritional quality of staple foodstuffs.

A report published by the Nuffield Council on Bioethics contains a number of case studies detailing the actual and potential benefits of GM crops for developing countries. The report offers a constructive contribution to the on-going debate on genetic modification technologies. The Government share the report's conclusions that achieving food security and reducing poverty in developing countries are complex issues, that GM crops are unlikely to feed the world but that in some circumstances they could make a useful contribution to improving the livelihoods of poor people in developing countries.

Recognising that there are both potential benefits and risks associated with GM crops, DFID believes that developing countries need to be able to make their own informed choices about whether to adopt GM technologies or not. The UK Government have pushed for the implementation of international legislation such as the Cartagena Protocol on Biosafety, which provides for rigorous assessment and management of the risks involved in the use of Genetically Modified Organisms. The UK has ratified this Protocol.

Hurricane Ivan

Jeff Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many Cayman Island citizens are estimated to have been (a) killed and (b) made homeless as a direct consequence of Hurricane Ivan. [189957]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: One Cayman Islands citizen is missing, presumed dead from the impact of Hurricane Ivan and one Caribbean resident was badly injured and subsequently died. The Cayman Islands Government estimate that 860 have been made homeless. Up to 20 per cent. of residential houses have been reportedly completely destroyed and some 20 per cent. have major damage and 5 per cent. are partially damaged.

Following the impact of the hurricane, HMS Richmond and the Royal Fleet Auxiliary Wave Ruler began helping the relief effort at the earliest opportunity. They were also able to provide medical staff and deliver medicines. DFID also responded to an urgent request from the Government of the Cayman Islands by providing urgent relief items, including plastic sheeting and have since sent flights containing potable water, hygiene materials and other requested items. The cost of this direct assistance is about £172,000. DFID has also contributed £500,000 to the International Federation of the Red Cross regional appeal, for the provision of emergency food, shelter needs, water and sanitation and various non-food items. The Regional Appeal includes support to 1,000 affected families in Cayman Islands for six months.

The British Government are also contributing around £55,000 for the deployment of the Bermuda Regiment for one month to assist in clear up operations and other support.

India (Public Services)

Mr. Challen: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development which consultants have been retained by his Department and agencies for which he is responsible to provide the Government of India with advice on the delivery of public services for each of the last five financial years; what the value of each contract was; and what the nature of the contractors' briefs was. [189208]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: The number and value of contracts let respectively are:

Between April 1999 and March 2004 DFID's procurement group in East Kilbride issued 191 contracts with a total value of £97,593,493. Between January 2000 and August 2004, DFID India's contracts and procurement advice section issued 1,009 contracts with a total value of £17,823,348. This section was set up in 1999 and no details are available before January 2000. Total spending on bilateral assistance to India in the five years from 1999 to 2003 amounted to £762,875,778.

It is not practical to provide briefs for this number of contracts, as this would incur a disproportionate cost. I have arranged for the documents entitled Procurement Group Programme Contracts April 1999-March 2004 and Summary of Contracts issued by DFID India to be placed in the Library.

Information and Communication Specialists

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many information and communication technology specialists are in full-time employment in the Department. [189588]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: DFID has 125 information and communications technology specialists in its employment across all UK and overseas offices. The numbers are broken down as follows:

	Number
United Kingdom
Information Systems Department	85
Business Transformation Unit	6
Information and Communication for Development	1
Total	92
Overseas
Regional IT Managers	6
Local IT administrators	27
Total	33

UK based staff are engaged in the design, development, deployment and support of ICT applications to support DFID's business processes. There is also ICT support in the Information and Communication for Development team to provide technical advice on the use of ICT in DFID supported programmes.

Regional IT Managers oversee the deployment and support of internal ICT systems for DFID offices in Southern Africa, East Africa, West Africa, India, South East Asia and the Caribbean. Full-time IT administrators are locally employed in DFID's larger overseas offices to provide administration and support for staff using the ICT systems. Strong ICT systems are central to DFID's ability to deliver effectively on its Public Service Agreement. The number of ICT staff employed by DFID is determined through strategic planning processes which define the business benefits and service levels and demand demonstrable efficiency.

CABINET OFFICE

Civil Service Pensions

Mr. Betts: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office (1) how many widows and widowers of civil servants who are beneficiaries of the Classic Civil Service pension scheme have remarried or decided to cohabit with a new partner and consequently lost their pension rights in the last 10 years; [190070]

(2) how much it is estimated it would cost to restore pensions rights to the widows or widowers of civil servants who have remarried or decided to cohabit with a new partner in the last 10 years. [190071]

Ruth Kelly: Details of the number of widows or widowers whose pensions were suspended on remarriage or cohabitation in the last 10 years are not readily available. Between 1 October 2002 and 31 August 2004, 325 widows' or widowers' pensions were suspended due to remarriage or cohabitation.

Based on data in respect of the period between 1 October 2002 and 31 August 2004, the estimated cost of restoring pensions rights to the widows or widowers of civil servants who have remarried or decided to cohabit with a new partner in the last 10 years is in the order of £50 million.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many widows or widowers of civil servants who have remarried or decided to cohabit with a new partner and consequently lost their civil service pensions have subsequently had their pensions restored on compassionate grounds in the last year. [190072]

Ruth Kelly: In the period 1 September 2003 to 31 August 2004, 16 widows or widowers of civil servants have had their previously ceased civil service spouses' pension restored to them.

Departmental Estate

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what revenues were generated by her Department's disposal of (a) the bunker at Carmarthen and (b) the Civil Service Sports Council, Chadwick street, referred to in paragraph 1.10 of the Cabinet Office Departmental Report 2004. [189990]

Ruth Kelly: Hill House, Carmarthen was sold via an administrative transfer to the National Assembly for Wales, for £100,000.

The building in Chadwick street occupied by the Civil Service Sports Council was sold for just over £4 million, to the Civil Service Sports Council Ltd.

Both sites were disposed of at existing current market valuation.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Forth: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what proportion of (a) his time and (b) the time of his officials is spent on fulfilling his ministerial responsibilities. [189389]

Mr. Milburn: I spend the time that is necessary to fulfil my ministerial responsibilities. My officials support me in carrying out these ministerial responsibilities.

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office (1) if she will list the additional functions (a) taken on and (b) anticipated to be taken on by her Department in 2004–05 in comparison with 2003–04; [189702]

(2) what recent assessment her Department has made of the extent to which it has (a) succeeded and (b) failed in its first objective of supporting the Prime Minister in leading the Government; [189715]

(3) in which areas of (a) policy and (b) operations her Department has (i) achieved and (ii) failed to achieve its second objective of achieving co-ordination across Government in each year since 2001. [189716]

Ruth Kelly: The Cabinet Office's role is outlined in our Public Service Agreement. Work in support of Cabinet Office objectives and targets is accounted for in the "Departmental Report, Autumn Performance Report and the Annual Report and Resource Accounts", all of which are published annually. Copies of these publications are available in the Library.

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how much overall her Department has budgeted to meet the additional overall cost of appointing a separate Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; into what principal categories this budget is broken down; and what the anticipated extra cost is of each such category. [189714]

Ruth Kelly: The cost of appointing a separate Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster will be met from within the existing Cabinet Office budget.

Departmental Websites

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what recent assessment she has made of the extent to which each Department's (a) informational and (b) interactive websites are used by members of the public, in comparison with other methods of communication. [189986]

Ruth Kelly: The Office for National Statistics (ONS) omnibus survey measures the use of government websites as a percentage of the population on a quarterly basis. Currently 28 per cent. of the adult population visit government websites. The most frequent use of government websites is informational—24 per cent. of the population visit for informational purposes, while 8 per cent. download forms and 6 per cent. transact.

"Preparing for Emergencies"

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office (1) what arrangements have been made for delivery of the booklet Preparing for Emergencies (a) to houses in multiple occupation and (b) to houses converted into flats; [189722]

(2) how many copies of the booklet Preparing for Emergencies have been (a) printed and (b) delivered to addresses in the United Kingdom. [189723]

Ruth Kelly: 26.7 million copies of "Preparing for Emergencies" have been printed in English and Welsh. Copies were also produced in each of the alternative languages and formats to meet initial demand. Extra copies of these are now being printed as further requests are received.

25.8 million copies were delivered to addresses in the United Kingdom through a national door-drop delivery. A television, radio and newspaper advertising campaign followed this to alert people to the fact that they should have received a copy of the booklet. It offered a number of alternative ways to get a copy of the booklet for people who had not yet received one.

Requests can be made, free of charge, by filling in and posting a newspaper coupon, or via the telephone orderline 0800 88 77 77 or via the website at www.preparingforemergencies.gov.uk.

This two stage strategy has allowed us to reach the greatest number of households in the UK, including those residents in properties divided into flats or multiple occupancy, who we were aware might be potentially difficult to reach.

Foreign Policy

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement on the methodology employed by her Department in co-ordinating policy development for (a) Iraq, (b) Zimbabwe and (c) the Middle East peace process. [189989]

Ruth Kelly: The Defence and Overseas Secretariat in the Cabinet Office oversees cross-government policy on a wide range of foreign policy matters. These currently include issues relating to Iraq, Zimbabwe and the Middle East Peace Process. This activity is undertaken through discussion with all Government Departments concerned, and through inter-departmental meetings at both ministerial and official level.

Internet Advertising

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how much money the Government intends to spend on advertising on the internet in (a) the current financial year and (b) the next financial year; and if she will list (i) the departments concerned and (ii) the amounts spent in each case. [189160]

Ruth Kelly [holding answer 16 September 2004]: The information requested is not held centrally. Information on total advertising spending is held by individual Departments.

However, Government online advertising, planning and buying is procured through a Central Office of Information (COI) rostered supplier.

Non-departmental Public Bodies

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office pursuant to her answer of 15 September 2004, Official Report, column 1591W, on non-departmental public bodies, if the Office will issue further guidance to non-departmental public bodies listed in the publication, Public Bodies, as not holding annual open meetings to encourage them to comply with the Code of Practice. [189769]

Ruth Kelly: On 17 September the Cabinet Office issued a new version of its guide "Non Departmental Public Bodies: A Guide for Departments" which has been placed on the Cabinet Office website. The new guide includes a section on openness and accountability which, among other guidance intended to encourage non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs) to be open and accountable to the community, refers to open meetings. This encourages NDPBs to hold open meetings at least once a year. NDPBs should advertise these widely to stakeholders and make a report on the outcomes or the minutes widely available. Departments have been asked to draw the new guide to the attention of all the teams sponsoring NDPBs. A copy of the new guide has been placed in the Library.

Regulatory Impact Unit

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many secondees from (a) small and medium enterprises and (b) businesses as a whole have worked in the Regulatory Impact Unit for each year since 2001. [189999]

Ruth Kelly: The number of secondees from private businesses employed by the Regulatory Impact Unit since 2001, as at 1 April of each year, is shown in the following table. To date none of the secondees has been from small and medium enterprises.

As at 1 April	Secondees
2001	4
2002	7
2003	4
2004	3

Special Advisers

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many special adviser posts which carry executive responsibilities are (a) filled and (b) unfilled; and whether it is intended to fill vacant posts. [189987]

Ruth Kelly: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by the former Cabinet Office Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Alexander), on 10 March 2004, Official Report, column 1515W.

There are no plans to make any further appointments.

DEFENCE

Aerospace Equipment Exports

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will break down the additional aerospace equipment exports listed in UK Defence Statistics by country, for each year since 1997. [188917]

Mr. Ingram: Estimates of total export deliveries and orders for defence equipment and services relating to the United Kingdom are published by the Defence Analytical Services Agency in "UK Defence Statistics"—the latest copy of which is available in the Library of the House. This includes data on additional aerospace equipment and services from a survey that is undertaken by the Society of British Aerospace Companies. A breakdown of the additional aerospace equipment exports line by country is not available, as the data are not collected at this level of detail. The Society of British Aerospace Companies do, however, publish data on aggregate UK Aerospace Companies' Military Export orders by broad regional destination—EU countries and the Rest of the World. These are available in their annual publication "UK Aerospace Facts and Figures".

Afghanistan

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to improve living and working conditions for UK personnel in Afghanistan. [188358]

Mr. Ingram: UK forces personnel in Afghanistan already have access to a comprehensive Operation Welfare Package. The largest concentration of UK Forces personnel in Afghanistan is at Camp Souter, Kabul. Facilities here are generally good, with brick built accommodation, however we are working on plans to upgrade the kitchen facilities and construct more ablutions in the barrack blocks. For personnel living and working in Mazar-e Sharif the intent is to upgrade the kitchen facilities, and replace the tented accommodation with brick-built UK designed complexes. The first stage of this should be completed early next year.

Aircraft (Grounding)

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what principles govern the grounding of Ministry of Defence aircraft. [189370]

Mr. Ingram: The only principle which governs the grounding of Ministry of Defence aircraft is that of airworthiness: if there is deemed to be an unacceptable risk in continuing with flying operations, aircraft will be grounded

C130K Hercules Fleet

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the case for extending the life of the C130K Hercules fleet beyond 2012. [188460]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 13 September 2004]: The out of service dates for in-service equipment are routinely reviewed as part of normal planning work within the Ministry of Defence. The Hercules C130K is one such case. No decisions have, however, been taken to extend its life beyond 2012.

Chequers

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many RAF personnel are employed at Chequers; and in what capacity. [190078]

Mr. Caplin: There are currently four RAF personnel employed at Chequers, comprising three stewards and one chef.

Detainees (US)

Sir Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many suspects originally detained by UK forces (a) worldwide since 2001 and (b) in Iraq since 2003 have been handed over to the USA for interrogation; how many of those suspects are still in US custody; and if he will make a statement. [185048]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the right hon. Member to my response to his question (172697) on 1 September 2004, Official Report, column 724W.

Since 2001 the United Kingdom forces have not transferred over any persons they apprehended to the United States specifically for interrogation.

Eurofighter

Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what financial commitments are involved in the Eurofighter contract. [188794]

Mr. Ingram: The United Kingdom's financial commitments to date to Eurofighter contracts total £11,193 million covering the development, production and in-service support of Tranche 1 aircraft and some preparatory activities for Tranche 2.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps his Department takes to ensure the compatibility of equipment held by the Falkland Islands Defence Force with that held by British troops stationed on the islands. [189376]

Mr. Ingram: The Royal Marine Warrant Officer serving on loan to the Falkland Islands Defence Force (FIDF) advises on compatibility of training and equipment. FIDF weapons are compatible with the ammunition types held by British forces on the Islands. The FIDF also trains regularly with the UK garrison to improve interoperability.

International Committee of the Red Cross Report (Iraq)

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reason it was decided not to provide the Prime Minister's special envoy on human rights in Iraq with the report by the International Committee of the Red Cross on alleged abuse of detainees held in British custody, dated February 2004. [173345]

Mr. Hoon: By the time the International Committee of the Red Cross produced its interim report in February both the two major concerns it raised, and the single minor one, had been dealt with. The International Commission of the Red Cross (ICRC) had also informed the Ministry of Defence officials in subsequent meetings that they were broadly content with the conditions and regime at the UK's Detention Centre at Shaibah. Consequently there was no reason for officials to bring it to the attention of Ministers or the Special Envoy.

Iraq

Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the population centres and districts in Iraq where coalition forces do not operate on the ground owing to force protection concerns. [189377]

Mr. Ingram: There are no areas in Iraq where multinational forces are unable to operate on the basis purely of force protection concerns. The multinational force can and does operate across the country in support of the Iraqi Interim Government.

There are areas in which multinational forces agree with Iraqi forces that there will be operational restriction. In some areas this is in order not to worsen existing tensions. Currently, parts of Fallujah, Samara, Ramadi and Baghdad are subject to varying degrees of restriction, though areas change as circumstances and/or activity by Anti-Iraqi Forces alter.

Adam Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether Colonel Chris Terrington made representations to his superiors about detainee mistreatment at Abu Ghraib. [188304]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 13 September 2004]: Colonel Terrington had no direct responsibility for any aspect of Abu Ghraib. He was not aware of any specific allegations of abuse. Though he was aware that an investigation was under way, he had no knowledge of its remit.

Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to the Oral Statement by the Prime Minister of 19 April 2004, Official Report, columns 21–37, on Iraq, whether the siege of Fallujah was in accordance with the principles laid down in the Coalition Provisional Authority's military and political strategy. [172792]

Mr. Hoon: All operations conducted by members of the international coalition in Iraq prior to the handover of sovereignty to the Interim Iraqi Government were in accordance with the aims of bringing peace to the country, returning it to its people through a democratic Iraqi Government and ridding it of internal and external terrorists and those wishing to use militias or armed insurgents to enforce their own rule against the wishes of the majority of Iraqis.

Mr. Kilfoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what liaison UK forces personnel have had with private (a) military and (b) intelligence contractors employed by the US Government. [175096]

Mr. Ingram: Specific guidance on contact with private military and security contractors is provided to United Kingdom forces personnel in Iraq. These recognise that there will be routine contact with such companies on day-to-day operational security matters, for example in respect of threat assessments and in order to de-conflict respective operations. Such liaison is essential to the success of the operation in Iraq.

Nimrod

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what factors contributed to the decision to upgrade the Nimrod R1 aircraft rather than replace it; and if he will make a statement. [188149]

Mr. Ingram: As part of the Project Helix assessment phase a balance of investment study is currently being conducted to determine the most cost effective solution to our capability requirements in this area. No final decision has yet been taken. Upgrading the Nimrod R MK1 airframe is one option being considered.

Olympic Games

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of HM armed forces competed in the 2004 Olympic Games. [190044]

Mr. Ingram: Three members of HM armed forces competed in the 2004 Athens Olympics, all from the Army. Private Musa Audu, representing Nigeria in the 4x400m relay, won a bronze medal; Captain Guy Fordham represented Great Britain in hockey and Lieutenant Robin Bourne Taylor in rowing.

Plastic Baton Rounds

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many civilians have been (a) killed and (b) injured by plastic baton rounds discharged in Iraq. [176091]

Mr. Ingram: United Kingdom forces did not use baton rounds in Iraq during major combat operations, which ended on 1 May 2003.

Since then UK Units have used baton rounds in situations, such as some instances of riot control, where there has been a clear threat to UK forces, civilians and/or property but where use of lethal force would have been a disproportionate response.

Since 1 May 2003, UK forces have reported all confirmed fatalities of which they are aware arising from incidents in which they were involved. We are not aware of any fatalities resulting from hits from baton rounds. UK forces have also provided medical assistance to a number of injured Iraqi civilians but we do not record centrally the causes of injury.

We are not in a position to comment on civilian casualties allegedly caused by other coalition partners.

Provigil

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what research he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated on the effects of (i) Provigil and (ii) amphetamines and similar drugs in the last eight years; and if he will make a statement. [187497]

Mr. Caplin: Records held by Qinetiq indicate that research was conducted on behalf of the Ministry of Defence into the effect of certain pharmaceutical agents of this type on sleep, performance and motion sickness. One of the drugs investigated was modafinil, which is the non proprietary name for Provigil. The other drugs investigated were pemoline, caffeine and ephedrine.

In line with normal practice, the MOD commissioned this research, which was approved by an independent ethics committee, in order to develop and maintain our understanding of scientific developments in this field.

RAF Bentwaters

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has a residual interest in the former Royal Air Force station at Bentwaters, Suffolk. [190077]

Mr. Caplin: The only interest which the Ministry of Defence retained in the former RAF Bentwaters, following its disposal in May 2004, is a lease for 2,000 years for an oil pipeline and pipeline termination point.

RAF Fylingdales

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the expected date of completion of the upgrading of RAF Fylingdales for the US Missile Defence System. [188741]

Mr. Hoon: Completion of equipment installation work and testing of the upgrade is expected by October 2005, from which time the radar will be able to support the missile defence mission. Decommissioning and removal of existing equipment will not be completed until summer 2006.

Recruitment

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many young people were recruited to (a) the Cheshire Regiment and (b) other parts of the armed forces in the Birkenhead area in each of the last 10 years. [188325]

Mr. Caplin: The information requested is as follows:

Naval Service

It is not possible to produce data for officers recruited to the Naval Services in the Birkenhead area as officers are recruited nationwide by Area Career Liaison Offices (ACLOs), which are dispersed around the country.

The recruiting of all Naval Ratings in the Birkenhead area is carried out through the Armed Forces Career Office (AFCO) in Liverpool and it is not possible to refine the information further. The following table shows the recruiting figures for Liverpool, from 1994 up to the present day.

	Number of recruits
1995–96	122
1996–97	282
1997–98	350
1998–99	355
1999–2000	307

2000–01	245
2001–02	286
2002–03	252
2003–04	168

Army

Similarly to the Naval Services, Army officers are not recruited through AFCOs so it is not possible to provide data on recruitment in a specific area.

The following table shows the numbers of soldiers enlisted into the Army through the Army Careers Information Office (AGIO) in Birkenhead between 1 April 2000 and 31 March 2004. Reliable data for earlier years is not held. The figures in brackets represent those recruited to the Prince of Wales Division Infantry, of whom all but a very few would join the 22nd (Cheshire) Regiment.

	Number of recruits
2000–01	158 (23)
2001–02	144 (29)
2002–03	125 (28)
2003–04	122 (53)

RAF

The figures for RAF recruits (both officers and airmen) provided are from the Liverpool area as it is not possible to differentiate between the sub-districts. Figures provided before 2000 have been compiled from an older IT system which unfortunately contains some omissions. Therefore, there are no data available for the recruitment of officers in the years 1994–95 and 1995–96, or for airmen in the years 1994–95 and 1996–97.

For the year 2003–04 it was possible to sort by postcode; accordingly, the overall total is for Liverpool with subtotals, in brackets, showing those recruited from Birkenhead postcodes.

	Officers	Airmen	Total
1993–94	8	188	196
1994–95	—	—	—
1995–96	—	82	—
1996–97	3	—	—
1997–98	2	160	162
1998–99	5	212	217
1999–2000	4	190	194
2000–01	3	197	200
2001–02	8	140	148
2002–03	5	175	180
2003–04	5 (0)	189 (45)	194 (45)

Regimental Amalgamations

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many regiments have remained unamalgamated throughout their history. [189711]

Mr. Caplin: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Intellectual Property

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what action she is taking in conjunction with other public agencies to strengthen protection of intellectual property in the creative arts. [189775]

Estelle Morris: I refer the hon. Member to my written ministerial statement of 19 July 2004, Official Report, column 2WS.

The Creative Industries Forum on Intellectual Property had its first meeting on 19 July 2004, jointly chaired by myself and my noble Friend the Minister for Science and Innovation, Lord Sainsbury of Turville, and agreed to focus on three main areas of work: Piracy and File-sharing; New Business Models; and Education and Communication. The Forum is due to meet again in late November 2004.

The Department also supports a range of initiatives being taken forward by the Patent Office, an executive agency of the Department for Trade and Industry, in this very important area of work.

Museums (Leeds)

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what funding (a) has been committed and (b) will be made available through the Renaissance in the Regions programme to (i) Armley Mills and (ii) other museums in Leeds. [190004]

Estelle Morris: Under the Designation Challenge Fund, which is part of the Renaissance in the Regions programme, grants of up to £202,300 have been awarded to Leeds Museums and Galleries, which includes Armley Mills.

Leeds Museums and Galleries is also a partner in the Yorkshire Regional Museum Hub, one of the nine regional hubs funded through Renaissance in the Regions. The total allocations to the Yorkshire Regional Museum Hub under Spending Review 2002 are as follows:

2005–06	1,180,000

It is difficult to specify what resources each hub partner receives, since much of the funding goes on general programmes that benefit all hub partners. It is for the hub to determine how much is allocated to cross-hub programmes and how much to individual hub partners.

Decisions on Renaissance funding beyond 2005–06 will be announced later this year.

Royal Parks

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much private finance has been attracted to the royal parks in each of the last seven years. [189197]

Mr. Caborn: In answering the question I have taken 'private finance' to encompass Public Private Partnership (PPP) or Private Finance Initiative (PFI) arrangements entered into by the Royal Parks, the agency which manages the Royal parks in London.

It is the Royal Parks' normal practice, under the terms of their contracts, to make their concessionaires responsible for the maintenance of the buildings they occupy. The Royal Parks do not normally have information about the expenditure incurred by concessionaires on maintenance or improvements. However, during the last seven years there have been three instances where concessionaires have made significant investment in the buildings—Pembroke Lodge in Richmond Park; Inn The Park in St. James's Park; and the boathouses in Regent's Park. The Royal Parks estimate that a total of £3.3 million of private finance has been invested in these ventures over the period. The Royal Parks does not have a breakdown of expenditure by year for these concessions.

Television Licences

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many households there are in each parliamentary constituency in Northern Ireland; and how many are in possession of a television licence. [189764]

Estelle Morris: The table shows how many households there are in each parliamentary constituency in Northern Ireland:

Parliamentary constituency	Number
Belfast, East	34,824
Belfast, North	36,383
Belfast, South	39,715
Belfast, West	30,992
East Antrim	32,789
East Londonderry	32,280
Fermanagh and South Tyrone	32,203
Foyle	35,947
Lagan Valley	38,405
Mid Ulster	28,350
Newry and Armagh	34,473
North Antrim	37,583
North Down	34,931
South Antrim	36,725
South Down	35,605
Strangford	37,898
Upper Bann	38,518
West Tyrone	29,097

TV Licensing, who administer the television licensing system as agent for the BBC, are not able to provide breakdowns by parliamentary constituency of the number of licences issued. However, I understand that at 31 March 2003, the total number of television licences in force in Northern Ireland was approximately 560,000.

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many households have been visited in each Northern Ireland parliamentary constituency in the past 12 months by staff investigating those who do not hold a current television licence. [189765]

Estelle Morris: TV Licensing, who administer the television licensing system as agent for the BBC, are not able to provide breakdowns by parliamentary constituency of the number of investigations into possible evasion. However, I understand that TV Licensing made 37,000 visits to homes in Northern Ireland in the 2003–04 financial year. This figure includes repeat visits to some addresses.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport in what circumstances (a) a person aged 75 years or over and (b) any other person allowed a concessionary television licence may take out such a licence additionally for a second or further property occupied by them; and what conditions (i) of residence or (ii) otherwise are required. [190018]

Estelle Morris: Free television licences for people aged 75 or over are available only for a person's sole or main residence. The £5 accommodation for residential care concession is available in respect of qualifying accommodation in which a retired person aged 60 or over or a disabled person is ordinarily resident, but does not extend to any other properties which such a person may own or occupy. The 50 per cent. reduction in the licence fee for registered blind people is available for any premises that are a residence of the individual concerned.

Wembley Stadium

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment her Department has made of the impact on the construction of the new Wembley Stadium of the sacking of engineering construction workers by Fastrack Site Services; and what discussions Ministers have had with the Football Association on this. [189686]

Mr. Caborn: The industrial action at Wembley National Stadium was resolved in mid-September, when Hollandia, a sub-contractor of Multiplex at the Wembley site, offered to re-employ all of the sacked men.

We have been monitoring the situation carefully, working closely with all those involved in the stadium development, including the Football Association.

I am reassured that the stadium remains on target for completion in January 2006 and to be built within budget.

Mr. Keith Bradley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many families resident in the City of Manchester claim child benefit for a student aged 18 years. [189457]

Dawn Primarolo: There were 1,320 such families at November 2002. The number of child benefit recipients in each local authority and constituency at November 2003 will be published on 14 October 2004, by Inland Revenue under National Statistics.

Overseas Travel

Mr Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his estimate is of the number of trips abroad by UK residents made in (a) 1975, (b) 1980, (c) 1990, (d) 2000 and (e) 2003. [189926]

Mr. Timms: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician, who has been asked to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Battle dated 11 October 2004:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question concerning the number of trips abroad by UK residents made in (a) 1975, (b) 1980, (c) 1990, (d) 2000 and (e) 2003. (189926)

The estimated numbers of visits overseas' made by UK residents in the years requested are shown in the table.

	Thousands
Year	Number of visits
1975	11,992
1980	17,507
1990	31,150
2000	56,837
2003	61,424

Insurance

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to improve regulation of the insurance industry; and if he will make a statement. [189950]

Mr. Timms: The Financial Services Authority (FSA) is responsible for regulating financial services in the UK. The FSA has identified prudential regulation of the insurance sector as a priority and has developed a comprehensive strategy to address this issue. In addition, the FSA will regulate the selling of general insurance business from 14 January 2005.

Royal Residences

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the accommodation formerly occupied by the late HRH Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother in Windsor Great Park consists of. [188550]

Mr. Timms: The accommodation occupied by HM Queen Elizabeth The Queen Mother within Windsor Great Park was:

(a) Royal Lodge consisting of the main house including staff accommodation, gardens and grounds of 40.3 hectares including tennis court and the miniature Welsh cottage; and within these grounds:

(b) Gardener's cottage;

(c) Chapel lodge;

(d) No. 6 Lodge Cottages;

(e) Police security accommodation.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans have been made for the future use of the cottage previously occupied by the late HRH Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother in Windsor Great Park; and what, other than accommodation, is included in the lease for the cottage in Windsor Great Park. [188551]

Mr. Timms: Royal Lodge has been leased to HRH The Duke of York with effect from 16 June 2003 for a period of 75 years. The lease is for all of the accommodation identified in answer to the right hon. Gentleman's question 188550.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what factors determined the length of the lease for the cottage in Windsor Great Park previously occupied by the late HRH Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother. [188552]

Mr. Timms: The lease to HRH The Duke of York for Royal Lodge is for 75 years.

The length of lease was agreed as a suitable period, taking into account the refurbishment of the property which the tenant is required to meet at his own expense in the first two years of the lease.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the basis of valuation of the lease for the cottage in Windsor Great Park previously occupied by the late HRH Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother was; and who carried out the valuation. [188553]

Mr. Timms: The terms and valuation of the lease were negotiated between The Crown Estate as landlord and HRH The Duke of York as tenant. Agents were appointed by both parties and were required to agree the terms of the lease on a commercial basis for the lease period of 75 years.

The rental valuation was to take into account the requirement of the landlord for the tenant to restore and modernise the property at his own expense to an agreed standard.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the current value of the lease for the cottage in Windsor Great Park previously occupied by the late HRH Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother is, using Treasury discounting figures. [188554]

Mr. Timms: The lease was granted on a commercial basis. It also takes into account the refurbishment of the property which the tenant is required to meet at his own expense in the first two years of the lease.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what financial basis the cottage in Windsor Great Park previously occupied by the late HRH Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother had previously been occupied. [188555]

Mr. Timms: The Duke and Duchess of York (later King George VI and Queen Elizabeth) were granted occupation of Royal Lodge by King George V in 1931, without charge.

The property reverted to The Crown Estate on the death of Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth The Queen Mother in 2002.

Average Mortality Rates

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the average mortality rate for (a) professional groups and (b) manual groups in (i) Hartlepool Primary Care Trust and (ii) England was in the last year for which figures are available. [189266]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 16 September 2004]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician, who has been asked to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Paul Burstow, dated 11 October 2004:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what the average mortality rate for (a) professional groups and (b) manual groups in (i) Hartlepool Primary Care Trust and (ii) England was in the last year for which figures are available. (189266)

The most recent available mortality rates for sub-national areas by Social Class, based on occupation, are those which use populations from the 1991 Census. Figures for the period 1991–1993 were published for England and its constituent Government Office Regions (GORs) for males aged 20–64. Figures are not available for smaller geographic areas. Those based on populations from the 2001 Census, and deaths in the years around that Census, are not yet available. Figures for 1991–1993 are included in the table below for England and the North East GOR (which includes the area covered by Hartlepool Primary Care Trust).

Mortality rates[1] by social class, males aged 20–64, England and the North East Government Office Region,[2] 1991–1993[3]

Children (Expenditure)

Jean Corston: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for each of the years 1996 to 2004, what the estimated expenditure was for all children and per child, in current and in real terms, on (a) family credit, (b) working families tax credit, (c) child benefit, (d) children's allowance, (e) child maintenance premium for parents with care on income support and (f) in total; and if he will express the total expenditure on children as a percentage of gross domestic product. [187122]

Dawn Primarolo: The information requested is provided in the following tables. The figures for child benefit, child allowances in Income Related Benefits (IRBs—income support, jobseeker's allowance and minimum income guarantee/pension credit) and family credit are for Great Britain; those for working families' tax credit (WFTC) and child tax credit are UK wide. There is no Government expenditure on the child maintenance premium in income support because it is funded by payments from the non-resident parent.

[2] The values for expenditure on family credit and WFTC are not total expenditure on these credits, but the amount of expenditure attributable to the children in the household.

[3] Some payments of WFTC were made in 2003–04 but these related to 2002–03 awards.

Jean Corston: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) following Chart 3.3 in his Department's Child Poverty Review for July 2004, what the total expenditure was in real terms and total expenditure as a percentage of gross domestic product on (a) child benefit, (b) tax credits and (c) other income-related benefits for children in (i) 1997, (ii) 2000 and (iii) 2004 (estimated); and what the respective amounts were for each for the first, sixth and tenth decile groups; [187123]

(2) for (a) economically active and (b) non-economically active households with children what the total expenditure was on children for (i) child benefit, (ii) tax credits and (c) other income related benefits for children in (A) 1997, (B) 2000; and what the estimated figures are for 2004. [187124]

Dawn Primarolo: The figures requested are in the following tables. The figures for child benefit, child allowances in Income Related Benefits (IRBs—income support, jobseeker's allowance and minimum income guarantee/pension credit) and family credit are for Great Britain; those for working families' tax credit (WFTC) and child tax credit are UK wide.

We do not have analysis by decile for 2000–01 and to produce it would incur disproportionate cost.

We classify individuals, rather than households, as economically active or non-economically active, so cannot provide the additional analysis requested.

Civil Service

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many Civil Service jobs will be lost in the (a) Huddersfield area, (b) Kirklees area, (c) West Yorkshire area and (d) Yorkshire and Humber Region as a result of the cuts announced in the 2004 Spending Review. [190297]

Mr. Boateng: Full details of the workforce changes announced in the Spending Review are being worked through, and we are consulting all stakeholders including unions and staff.

Departments will come forward in due course with details of workforce changes once plans are finalised.

Disabled People

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the major initiatives the Treasury has undertaken since 1997 in relation to disabled people. [188151]

Mr. Timms: I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer from the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions of 16 September 2004, Official Report, columns 1738–41W. My Department works closely with DWP on some of these initiatives. Treasury's 2004 Departmental Report (Cm 6222) presented to Parliament on 30 April 2004 contains details of that work. The Report was also deposited in the Library and made available online at http://www.hm-treasury.gov.uk

Economy

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the state of the economy. [190155]

Mr. Timms: The UK economy has continued to perform strongly, thanks to the domestic macroeconomic stability that this Government's policies have delivered. UK GDP grew by 3.5 per cent. in the year to the first half of 2004, up from 2 per cent. in the same period of 2003 and consistent with the Budget 2004 forecast. Meanwhile, the UK has the lowest rate of unemployment in the G7 and inflation is at historically low levels.

The Government will update their forecasts for the UK and world economies in Pre-Budget Report 2004.

Employee Financial Participation

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what steps are being taken by regional enterprise departments and agencies (a) to develop employee ownership and (b) to meet the intention of doubling the number of UK companies with employee financial participation; [189123]

(2) what the distribution of share incentive plans (SIPs) is in (a) listed companies, (b) small and medium enterprises, (c) companies whose schemes were their first move into employee financial participation and (d) companies who introduced SIP as a replacement for older schemes; [189124]

(3) how many (a) companies and (b) employees are covered by share incentive plans (i) in total, (ii) as a percentage of the workforce involved and (iii) as a percentage of the total UK workforce; [189125]

(4) how many employee ownership schemes there are in which employees hold a majority stake, broken down by geographical distribution. [189126]

John Healey: The nine Regional Development Agencies (RDAs) in England, and the devolved administrations in Scotland and Wales, have responsibility for supporting and promoting businesses activity and enterprise within each region and country of Great Britain. From April 2005 the RDAs will adopt devolved responsibility for the management of the Business Link network throughout England, which provides advice and support to businesses on a wide range of issues, including employee share ownership. The Scottish and Welsh Administrations already hold devolved responsibility for the provision of equivalent services in Scotland and Wales. The Northern Ireland Executive holds similar responsibilities for Northern Ireland when power is devolved to them.

National Statistics on the take up of Share Incentive Plan and other employee share schemes are published on the Inland Revenue website at the following internet address: http://www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk/stats/emp_share_schemes/menu.htm

Marine Stewardship

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much the Crown Estate spent on marine stewardship programmes in each year since 1994. [188429]

Mr. Timms: The Crown Estate formally established a marine stewardship programme in 2000 following allocation of funding by the Board of The Crown Estate. This provides funding for community initiatives, education programmes, aquaculture research, seabed research and the renewable communities fund.

Prior to 2000, funding for stewardship initiatives was provided via a number of different programmes. The introduction of the marine stewardship programme led to a more co-ordinated approach and a single budget stream.

The funding awarded under the marine stewardship programme is as follows:

	Total
2004-05	[1]358,000
2003-04	496,000
2002-03	462,000
2001-02	411,000
2000-01	383,000
1999-2000	341,000
1998-99	304,000

[1] As of 1 September 2004.

Information before 1998 is not available as it is either unavailable in an easily identifiable format, or it is outside the statutory period for which financial records are kept.

Money Laundering

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what evidence he has collated on whether holders of gilts have been used as a front by money launderers; and what safeguards are in place to prevent the information provided by gilt-holders (a) breaching human rights legislation and (b) falling into the wrong hands. [189653]

Mr. Timms: To the best of our knowledge few, if any, major cases of money laundering in the UK have yet been seen to involve gilts. It is, however, possible that gilts might be targeted in the future and, for this reason, it is essential that HM Treasury maintain robust preventative measures and deterrents. HM Treasury believes it has adopted a proportionate response in balancing the individual's right to privacy against the need to "know your customer", in line with best market practice and guidance issued by the Joint Money Laundering Steering Group. HM Treasury and the current and prospective Registrars maintain robust data and system security procedures and controls.

Pension Schemes (Public Sector)

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the extra gross pension liability accruing annually in (a) funded and (b) unfunded public sector pension schemes. [185703]

Mr. Boateng: The value of the liabilities for each main, centrally administered scheme is contained in the report of the actuary as published in the schemes' Resource Accounts. The extra gross pension liability accruing annually for each such scheme is shown in the notes to those Resource Accounts.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Burnett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the capital liabilities in respect of private finance initiative contracts were in each year since 1990–91, broken down by department. [189830]

Mr. Boateng: PFI contracts where the assets concerned are on the balance sheets of procuring authorities are reported in the accounts of the procuring authorities. Those accounts also show a capital liability to repay the finance lease funding assets reported on balance sheet.

The estimated capital value of signed PFI contracts where capital assets are accounted for on departmental balance sheets is £20.7 billion. This represents 54 per cent. of the total estimated capital value of PFI contracts signed to date.

A list of PFI contracts signed to April 2004 is available on the HM Treasury public website: http://www.hm-treasury.gov.uk/documents/public_partnerships/ppp_pfi_stats.cfm

Mr. Burnett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the annual revenue or recurring liabilities in respect of private finance initiative contracts were in each year since 1990–91, broken down by Department. [189831]

Mr. Boateng: Information on unitary charge payments made under PFI contracts are reported in the accounts of procuring authorities and are a matter for their Departments.

Projected estimates of aggregate total payments under PFI contracts across Government for the next 25 years have been published in the Budget since 1999.

Data on projections of aggregate payments made before 1999 are not held centrally and could only be collected at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Burnett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what professional and other costs were incurred in respect of private finance initiative contracts in each year since 1990–91, broken down by Department. [189832]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested is not held centrally and could only be gathered at disproportionate cost.

Self-Employed Taxpayers (Leeds)

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his Department's latest estimate is of the number of self-employed taxpayers in the Leeds, West constituency. [189946]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer my hon. Friend to table "3.13 Income and Tax By County and Region, 2001–02", on the Inland Revenue website: www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk/stats/income_distribution/table-313-2001-02.pdf Figures for 2002–03 will be published in November.

Small Businesses (Leeds)

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his latest estimate is of the number of registered small businesses in the Leeds, West constituency. [189947]

Mr. Timms: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician, who has been asked to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. John Battle, dated 11 October 2004:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent question concerning the latest estimate of the number of registered small businesses in the Leeds, West constituency. (189947)

The latest available information relates to 2003 and shows that the number of small businesses in the Leeds, West constituency registered for Value Added Tax is 1,445.

Further information about the number of businesses in the United Kingdom is available from the National Statistics publication "PA1003—Size Analysis of United Kingdom Businesses 2003" available free of charge on the National Statistics website: http://www.statistics.gov.uk/pa1003

Tax Credits

Norman Lamb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many new claims for tax credits have been received but not yet processed. [188898]

Dawn Primarolo: As at 31 August 2004, there were around 55,000 claims that were waiting for further information or were being verified. Over 100,000 new claims were received during August.

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects the Inland Revenue to adjust the levels of repayment for individuals who have been overpaid tax credits. [189724]

Dawn Primarolo: The Inland Revenue's Code of Practice 26 "What happens if we have paid you too much tax credit?" confirms the maximum amounts by which the Inland Revenue would reduce the current year's tax credits to recover overpaid tax credit from 2003–04. A copy of the Code of Practice has been placed in the Library of the House and the text can be found on the Inland Revenue website on www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk. The content of the code is kept under review.

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many recipients of tax credits were found to have been overpaid in each year since 2001, broken down by (a) type of credit and (b) bands of overpayments; [189743]

(2) how many recipients of tax credit overpaid in each year since 2001 have been (a) subject to attempts at recovery of overpayment, (b) subject to no such attempts and (c) subject to such attempts which have now been abandoned, broken down by type of credit; [189744]

(3) how much tax credit overpaid was or is anticipated to be recovered in each year since 2001, broken down by type of credit; [189745]

(4) what the value is of tax credit overpaid in each year since 2001 which have been (a) subject to attempts at recovery of overpayment, (b) subject to no such attempts and (c) subject to such attempts which have now been abandoned, broken down by type of credit. [189746]

Dawn Primarolo: For working families' and disabled person's tax credits, I refer the hon. Member to my answer to the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) on 12 November 2003, Official Report, column 394W.

For child and working tax credits, complete figures for overpaid 2003–04 awards will not be available until these awards are finalised.

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many working tax credit back-dated payment claims were outstanding on (a) 1 January and (b) 1 June by more than six weeks; and if he will make a statement. [186322]

Dawn Primarolo: This information is not available. Claims for tax credits are normally put into payment quickly unless the Inland Revenue needs more information to process them. At any date, there are always some claims for which additional information is being sought, and in some circumstances this can delay the claim being put into payment.

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he plans to take to ensure software upgrades to the working tax credit system are installed; what impact he expects the upgrades to have on the outstanding back-dated payment claims; and if he will make a statement. [186326]

Dawn Primarolo: There are regular, planned, upgrades and releases of software to add new functionality for the tax credits cycle—for example, in April 2004 there was increased functionality in connection with finalisation and renewal of tax credits claims for 2003–04 and 2004–05. Upgrades to software are not expected to have a significant effect on the numbers of claims awaiting processing.

Tobacco Consumption

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact on the economy of reduced tobacco consumption. [189822]

John Healey: Isolating the impact on the economy of a particular public health trend, such as declining tobacco consumption, is very difficult. However, the Wanless Report, "Securing Good Health for the Whole Population", presents a range of evidence about the impact of smoking on public health, indicating that smoking kills 120,000 people in the UK every year, costing the NHS up to £1.7 billion a year and has wider costs such as productivity losses from ill health and absenteeism.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Agricultural Wages

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on this year's Agricultural Wages Board announcement. [189919]

Alun Michael: The Agricultural Wages Board is an independent body and the Agricultural Wages Act 1948 gives the Secretary of State no authority to intervene in, or seek to influence, Board decisions. Its decisions are announced by public notices in the farming press and by a press release whose wording is agreed by the Chairman of the Board and the leaders of the two sides (the lead representative of the National Farmers Union and the Transport and General Workers Union). In view of this it would not be appropriate for me to comment on the outcome of the recent pay negotiations.

Arable Farmers

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) what assessment she has made of the difficulties facing arable farmers in the UK following the poor weather this summer; [188560]

(2) if she will compensate arable farmers badly affected by this summer's bad weather. [188561]

Alun Michael: Our latest assessment is that this year's harvest is now largely complete, despite very substantial delays and difficulties in many parts of the country as a result of the extremely wet weather during the summer. Total yield is likely to be higher than last year, when output fell because of excessive heat and drought. But the majority of crops will be of poorer quality than expected, reducing farmers' returns in a weaker market, in addition to more expensive field and drying operations. There will also be some knock-on effects in relation to plantings and establishment of following crops.

Having considered the position very carefully in close contact with farmers' representatives and following discussions between my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State, and the NFU President on 16 September, it has been concluded that it would be more effective to devote special efforts to making full payments in the worst affected areas at the start of the payment window on 16 November, rather than attempting to make partial payments a few weeks earlier that would have to be topped-up in a separate operation later. The areas in question are likely to include Northumberland, Tyne and Wear, County Durham, North and East Yorkshire, North Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire, Leicestershire, Rutland and Northamptonshire.

We are continuing to work closely with farming organisations to ensure the most effective targeting of these efforts and to explore other ways in which existing schemes and resources can be used to help to mitigate the problems that we accept many arable farmers are facing.

Automotive Emissions

Richard Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what emissions level has been established for the automotive sector in the UK National Allocation Plan; and what this represents as a proportion of actual emissions in 2002. [186275]

Mr. Morley: The UK National Allocation Plan, which was submitted to the European Commission on 30 April 2004 provided provisional sector-level allocations. Government have always made it clear that the allocations would be revisited in the light of updated emissions projections; verification of baseline data; and the inclusion of additional installations. The overall level of allowances to be set in the Final Allocation Decision will be reviewed in the light of these changes. In the April National Allocation Plan the automotive sector is included in the engineering and vehicles sector, which was given an indicative annual allocation of one million tonnes of CO_2. This figure is 100 per cent. of the actual emissions reported in 2002.

Government aim to publish a revised list of installation-level allocations later in the year. Following this there will be a period where industry will have the opportunity to correct any errors of fact prior to the final allocation decision.

Biodiesel

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what licences are needed by farmers producing biodiesel by processing used cooking oil. [190109]

Mr. Morley: A pollution prevention control permit is required for the esterification of used (waste) or virgin cooking oils in chemical plant to produce biodiesel. A waste management licence is required for the commercial filtering of waste vegetable oils to produce biodiesel.

Unless the used cooking oil was agricultural waste, a farmer would be subject to these controls.

Agricultural waste is currently excluded from the waste management licensing regime under section 75 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. Agricultural waste is any substance or object from premises used for agriculture which the holder discards or intends to discard.

Bovine TB

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many cattle tested positive for tuberculosis in the last 12 months. [188489]

Mr. Bradshaw: 18,676[1] cattle were removed and slaughtered under TB control measures during the period 1 August 2003–31 July 2004.

[1] Provisional data, as downloaded from the State Veterinary Service database 16 September 2004. The figure includes animals which reacted to the tuberculin test and those which showed an inconclusive reaction to the test on three occasions.

British Cattle Movement Service

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much the British Cattle Movement Service cost in each year since 2000. [189627]

Alun Michael: The costs of running the British Cattle Movement Service (BCMS) which runs the Cattle Tracing System, in each year since 2000 are set out in the following table.

2000–01	13.40
2001–02	14.24
2002–03	15.79
2004–05	[2]14.50

[1] The BCMS merged with the Rural Payments Agency on 1 April 2003.

[2] Projection to year end.

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many cattle passport (a) applications and (b) movement notifications were (i) received late, (ii) received late but accepted on compassionate or other grounds and (iii) received late and rejected in each of the last five years for which records are available. [189083]

Alun Michael: No cattle movement notification made to the British Cattle Movement Service (BCMS) have ever been rejected because they were late.

All calf birth registrations received by BCMS are now, and have always been, fully processed and the animals entered onto the national database, no matter how late they have arrived.

The total number of birth registrations received late in each of the last five years has been:

	Number
2000	177,862
2001	188,509
2002	212,998
2003	202,395
2004	22,415

The number of late birth registrations in respect of which full cattle passports were refused over the last five years were 13,448 animals between 1 January 1999 and 20 November 2003, and 25,746 animals between 20 November 2003 and 3 September 2004.

Of these cases, 7,616 and 4,998 animals respectively have had passports issued for them so far after appeals have been considered. These figures cannot be broken down into individual calendar years.

The BCMS merged with the Rural Payments Agency on 1 April 2003.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the operation of the cattle passport scheme. [189480]

Alun Michael: The cattle passport scheme is operated by the British Cattle Movement Service (BCMS) which became part of the Rural Payments Agency from the 1 April 2003. The cattle passport scheme has been in operation since 1996 and the national cattle database contains the details of the 9.9 million animals that make up the national herd.

The BCMS operates to ISO 9001:2000 standards, is registered with the British Standards Institute and its operating practices have received the Kite mark. In addition to paper reporting systems, BCMS have provided a call centre and online facilities via a website for cattle keepers to use. The BCMS is constantly striving to improve its service and efficiency.

BSE

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what evidence she has collated that BSE exists in British cattle. [189620]

Mr. Bradshaw: BSE was identified in British cattle by the Central Veterinary Laboratory in November 1986. The disease is defined on the basis of its clinical history and the characteristic pathological changes that occur in the brain. Cases of the disease in Britain are confirmed by veterinary pathologists on brain tissue from suspect animals. Biochemical screening tests for the diagnosis of BSE from brain samples are also recognised within the EU and by the International Office for Animal Health.

The occurrence of BSE in British cattle has been rigorously monitored using these methods since 1987. The numbers of cases collated are recorded on a graph which will be made available in the Library of the House.

Further information on the disease and statistics in Britain can be found on the Defra website at: www.defra.gov.uk/animalhealth&welfare/BSE/statistics/BSE statistics www.defra.gov.uk/animalhealth&welfare/BSE/publications/progressreport

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many BSE cases there were in 2003; and in cattle of what ages. [189621]

Mr. Bradshaw: For Great Britain there were 547 confirmed cases of BSE in 2003 in cattle of the following age groupings:

Age (months)	Total number of cases
48–53	3
54–59	5
60–65	10
66–71	7
72–77	3
78–83	8
84–89	27
90–95	40
96–101	69
102–107	58
108–113	57
114–119	48
120–125	43
126–131	34
132–137	28
138–143	16
≥144	90
Total 2003	547

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many cattle born after (a) 1999, (b) 2000, (c) 2001, (d) 2002 and (e) 2003 have contracted BSE. [189622]

Mr. Bradshaw: In the UK there have been 12 confirmed cases of BSE in cattle born in 1999 and one case born in 2000. No cases have as yet been confirmed in cattle born after 2000.

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of whether the passport system has (a) prevented BSE and (b) been used to collect evidence of the age of cattle likely to be affected. [189623]

Alun Michael: The introduction of Cattle Passports improved our ability to check the movement of animals during their lives, which makes it possible to trace animals potentially exposed to a disease risk such as the offspring and cohorts of BSE cases, and to trace the potential sources of infection.

Cattle passports have played an important role in identifying cattle that are required to be tested under the EU's BSE surveillance programme. This programme has enabled us to gain a more detailed understanding of BSE epidemiology, notably its prevalence across various age groups. This has allowed the monitoring of the beneficial effects of the control measures applied and, most importantly, facilitated our submission to the European Commission for moderate risk status for the UK.

Cattle Passports/Registration

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many farmers have missed the deadline for cattle registration; and how many animals this affects. [189479]

Alun Michael: The number of late cattle registrations and the number of keepers that these figures represent are set out in the following table:

	Total applications	Total late applications	Percentage late	Keepers missing deadline[1]
1999	2,993,238	90,854	3.0	31,656
2000	3,056,014	177,862	5.8	61,973
2001	2,998,238	188,509	6.3	65,683
2002	2,885,188	212,998	7.4	74,215
2003	2,952,404	202,395	6.9	70,521
2004[2]	2,135,982	22,415	1.0	7,810

[1] Exact Figures for individual keepers are not available. The average number of animals in an appeal for 2003–04 is 2.87. We have used this to estimate keeper figures for earlier years.

[2] Figures up to 3 September 2004.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) what scope the Government have to allow late registration of cattle under EU rules; [189481]

(2) what plans the Government have to review the policy on cattle registration. [189482]

Alun Michael: The EU Regulations governing the identification and tracing of cattle require birth notifications of cattle to be made within 27 days of birth. There is no scope to extend the deadline beyond 27 days. We do not think that 27 days is an unreasonable deadline, bearing in mind the need for accurate and timely data if we are to manage disease outbreaks such as foot and mouth disease. The penalties to be applied in respect of late notifications are at the discretion of Member States.

Our current policy of refusing passports for late applications was introduced with the agreement of the industry and has been successful in reducing the number of late registrations of cattle from 6.9 per cent. to 1 per cent.. In light of the industry's concerns my officials are reviewing the existing enforcement arrangements, but any change must maintain the level of improvement we have achieved so far.

Cattle Vaccinations

Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what percentage of cattle herds are vaccinated against (a) bovine viral diarrhoea and (b) leptospirosis. [189600]

Mr. Bradshaw: Bovine viral diarrhoea (BVD) and leptospirosis are not notifiable diseases. However VLA publishes quarterly reports which looks at herd prevalence, through analysis of bulk milk serology in dairy herds, in respect of BVD and leptospirosis which are available to view on their website.

Information on the numbers of animals vaccinated is not held by Defra or by the Veterinary Laboratories Agency (VLA).

All veterinary medicinal products are assessed for their safety, quality and efficacy before being authorised for sale in the UK.

There are three Bovine Viral Diarrhoea virus (BVDV) vaccines authorised in the UK for cattle to protect adult cattle against infection or to protect the foetus against transplacental infections caused by BVDV.

There are two Bovine Leptospirosis vaccines authorised in the UK to project cattle against leptospirosis caused by Leptospira borgpeterserenii serovar hardjo and/or Leptospira interrogans serovar hardjo.

Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what percentage of breeding cows are vaccinated against (a) calf scour and (b) pneumonia. [189601]

Mr. Bradshaw: Calf Scour and pneumonia are not notifiable diseases. Information on the numbers of animals vaccinated is not held by Defra or by the Veterinary Laboratories Agency (VLA).

All veterinary medicinal products are assessed for their safety, quality and efficacy before being authorised for sale in the UK.

There are five "Calf scour" vaccines authorised in the UK to protect calves against various disease pathogens that could produce diarrhoea in young animals. These vaccines provide protection against bovine rotavirus (BRV), bovine corona virus (BCV) and "Escherichia coli."

There are 14 "Calf pneumonia" vaccines authorised in the UK to protect calves against various respiratory disease pathogens including Bovine Rhinotracheitis (IBR), Bovine Parainfluenza virus (P13), Pasteurella (Mannheimia) haemolytica, Bovine Respiratory Syncytial virus (BRSV), Bovine Viral Diarrhoea virus (BVDV).

CITES

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many exotic animals have been imported into the UK in each of the last 10 years, broken down by Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species listed species. [188146]

Mr. Morley: CITES listed species are placed into one of three appendices.

Appendix I—endangered species threatened and therefore prohibited from commercial trade;

Appendix II—vulnerable species that may become endangered unless trade is strictly regulated; and

Appendix III—species which are protected in a particular range state, for which the co-operation of other CITES Parties is required to ensure that the trade is lawful.

The following table shows the numbers of live animals imported into the UK by each CITES Appendix. (Current records commenced in 1997).

	Appendix	Number
1997	I	58
	II	25,939
	III	1,665
1998	I	103
	II	46,784
	III	1
1999	I	152
	II	43,354
	III	0
2000	I	161
	II	60,874
	III	81
2001	I	91
	II	65,039
	III	51
2002	I	124
	II	74,528
	III	67
2003	I	99
	II	82,730
	III	68
2004	I	57
	II	17,724
	III	70

There are various possible reasons for the increase. For example, increased numbers may reflect new listings, some of which (e.g.—sea horses) may be imported in large quantities; wildlife trade is dynamic, and trends over time may reflect diverse factors such as policy decisions in exporting countries, traders gaining access to new sources of supply, market forces, and the actions of CITES.

Trade patterns are monitored quarterly by JNCC, and worrying trends identified. Individual applications are also scrutinised and may be refused if they are considered to be detrimental to the species concerned (thus leading to consideration by the EU Scientific Review Group as to whether action to limit such trade is required).

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what her policy is on the proposal by Australia at the next Convention on Trade in Endangered Species Conference of the Parties to list the great white shark on Appendix II with zero quota. [189688]

Mr. Morley: I understand that Australia has now decided to withdraw its proposal for a zero quota and I am pleased to confirm that both the UK and the EU member states are happy to support an Appendix II listing for the great white shark.

Cormorants

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what estimate she has made of the population of cormorants; what assessment she has made of trends in the change in population over recent years; and if she will make a statement. [188960]

Mr. Bradshaw: Seabird 2000 and the Wetland Bird Survey provide current estimates for the cormorant population in Great Britain of 8,470 breeding pairs and 23,000 wintering individuals. Winter cormorant abundance is estimated to have increased by 70 per cent. between 1989 and 2001.

Countryside and Rights of Way Act

Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many applications she has received for areas to be designated under Schedule 6 of the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000; how many have been approved; and how many footpaths have been (a) closed and (b) diverted on the grounds of crime prevention as a result. [189508]

Alun Michael: We have received 23 applications for designation since the legislation came into force in February 2002. Twenty have been approved covering 72 areas in England. Of the remaining three applications, two were withdrawn and one is still pending. We are currently waiting for that authority to provide additional evidence in support of its application.

Since the 72 areas were designated, eighteen orders have been made under new section 118b of the Highways Act 1980 to close rights of way to prevent crime. So far, two of these have resulted in highways being closed. Another sixteen orders are awaiting confirmation by the local highway authority or Secretary of State. We are not aware of any diversion orders as yet.

Departmental Costs

Richard Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the cost was of printing the Department's headed notepaper in (a) 1996–97 and (b) the latest year for which figures are available. [184377]

Alun Michael: Defra was formed in 2001. Electronic templates have been used to create headed notepaper as needed so the Department does not use printed headed notepaper.

The information for 1996–97 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Richard Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) how much the Department and its predecessors spent on (a) mobile phones, (b) hospitality and (c) taxis in (i) 1996–97 and (ii) the latest accounting period; [184380]

(2) how much her Department spent on (a) mobile phone costs, (b) hospitality and (c) taxis in (i) 1996–97 and (ii) the latest year for which figures are available. [186033]

Alun Michael: Defra's spend on mobile phones in 2003–04 was £666,000. Information for 1996–97 could only be provided at disproportionate cost. Information on hospitality was given in my answer of 20 May 2004, Official Report column 1109W. We do not hold information on travel by taxi centrally and this could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Departmental Paper (Recycling)

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what proportion of the Department's redundant documentation, waste paper and card is recycled; and if she will make a statement on the Department's paper recycling policy. [188439]

Mr. Morley: It is not possible to give a figure for the proportion of redundant documentation in waste paper and card that is recycled. We do not collect data on the total amount of this material within Defra. Paper recycling facilities are in place at virtually all Defra buildings, but some accept newspapers and other types of paper waste.

We continue to increase the proportion of our total waste that is recycled or recovered each year and paper waste forms a large percentage of this. In 2003–04 Defra's total waste arising was 4,689 metric tons, of which 55 per cent. was recycled or recovered. Recycled paper constituted 16 per cent. of the Department's total waste and 61 per cent. of its recycled waste by weight.

The Department is developing a sustainable waste management strategy aimed at reducing the total amount of waste produced and increasing the proportion that is recycled. Paper recycling will be an important part of this strategy.

Farming

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when she next plans to meet the National Farmers' Union to discuss the Government's plans for the farming industry. [184049]

Margaret Beckett: My ministerial team and I have numerous meetings with the National Farmers' Union covering many different subjects.

Fisheries

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans she has to meet (a) her French Government counterparts and (b) the EU Fisheries Commissioner to discuss (i) cetacean strandings in the English Channel and (ii) the future of pair trawling for bass. [190106]

Mr. Bradshaw: Officials have already met with the European Commission to explore their recent statement of commitment to co-operate with the UK and other member states to find an effective solution to the cetacean by-catch problem. The technical meeting referred to in their response to the UK closure request is already being arranged and will allow the UK to present its findings in the bass fishery to other member states. The UK and the Commission will build on this sharing of knowledge to progress discussion on the problem and investigate possible mitigation measures.

As this process develops, I will take every opportunity to seek to persuade my counterparts in all member states, and the Commission, of the need for further action in this area.

Flooding

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will publish publications and reports (a) undertaken by, (b) commissioned by and (c) undertaken in collaboration with her Department on flooding over the last five years. [189893]

Mr. Morley: Recent reports undertaken or commissioned by Defra are available through the Defra website, including all research reports published since January 2003. Earlier reports are available on request.

Where Defra has been a collaborator in a project then the information will often be referenced on the Defra website but detailed arrangements for publication and dissemination will generally rest with the organisation responsible for leading the work.

Ghost Ships

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) if she will make a statement on the continued presence of the four ghost ships at Hartlepool; and under what legal basis they remain there; [189559]

(2) for what reason the weather window afforded by summer has not been used to return the four ghost ships at Hartlepool to the US; [189560]

(3) if she will set out the options she has assessed for the future of the four ghost ships, currently docked at Hartlepool, indicating the (a) timeline and (b) decision-making process that applies to these options. [189561]

Mr. Morley: The future of the four US ships at Teesside is primarily a matter for the US Marine Administration, as owners of the vessels, and Able UK, who are intending to seek the necessary permissions for dismantling the vessels at their Teesside facility.

The four US ships are currently docked in Able UK's Graythorp dock on Teesside. The necessary permissions are being sought by Able UK for dismantling to take place at this location. Relevant applications will be considered and the outcome will depend upon the relevant regulators.

Dismantling work is prevented and the dock facility is subject to regular inspection by the Environment Agency in liaison with the Health and Safety Executive. The results of environmental monitoring indicate that storage of the four US naval ships at the Graythorp dock has not had a detrimental impact or posed a significant threat to the environment or human health.

GM Crops

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of (a) the advantages and (b) the disadvantages of genetically-modified crops to developing countries. [190094]

Mr. Morley: This is a matter for the Department for International Development.

Horticulture

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the budget for (a) research and development in and (b) marketing support to the horticulture industry was in each year since 1997. [187500]

Alun Michael: The Department's annual budget for research and development on horticulture and potatoes in England and Wales for the budget years 1997–98 to 2004–05 was as set out in the following table. In 2004–05 an additional £2,250,000 was set aside to support the guarantees provided to the University of Warwick and East Mailing Research following the restructuring of Horticulture Research International.

Financial year	R&D
1997–98	12,202,000
1998–99	12,273,000
1999–2000	11,069,000
2000–01	11,021,000
2001–02	10,807,000
2002–03	9,804,000
2003–04	9,845,000
2004–05	9,422,000

There is no specific budget for marketing support to the horticulture industry but grants of £421,000 and £498,000 respectively were made to the industry under the Agricultural Development Scheme in 2000 and 2003. The industry also benefits from EU payments to producer organisations under the fresh fruit and vegetables regime of the common agricultural policy.

Irrawaddy Dolphin

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make it her policy to support the proposal at the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species—Conference of the Parties 13 in Bangkok on 2 to 14 October to list the Irrawaddy dolphin in Appendix 1; and if she will make a statement. [189380]

Mr. Morley: Although the UK had some initial reservations about the trade and population data, I am pleased to report that we have now decided that an Appendix 1 listing is in the best interest of this species. We therefore fully support the current EU position of support for the proposed listing, subject to the views of the Range States.

Lions

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what action her Department is taking (a) to secure the future of breeding conditions for lions existing in the wild and (b) to preserve the lion from extinction. [189895]

Mr. Morley: It is the responsibility of the relevant range states to take appropriate action to secure the long-term future of the lion, as only they have the power to intervene directly in this matter.

However, we will continue to utilise our role within the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species (CITES) to press for collaborative action to ensure that the lion does not become endangered as a result of unsustainable trade in hunting trophies or for any other reason.

Litter

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how her Department's litter guidance policy has affected the residents of Leyton and Wanstead. [187747]

Mr. Morley: We are constantly looking at developing policy to enable local authorities to tackle litter more effectively, not just in Leyton and Wanstead but all over the country.

Local authorities have a statutory duty, set out in part 4 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990, to deal with litter in their area. We have set out the recommended cleansing times in the Code of Practice on Litter and Refuse. We are currently reviewing the Code with a view to consulting on a revised Code in the new year.

In addition the Government provide funding to EnCams to raise awareness of a number of issues that affect the quality of the local environment, including litter. EnCams, formerly known as the Tidy Britain Group are an environmental charity and have over 50 years experience of campaigning to raise awareness of litter.

We have just concluded a consultation exercise on Clean Neighbourhoods that proposed a range of measures to improve the ability of local authorities to respond to litter and other issues affecting public space. Once we have analysed the comments received we hope to bring forward legislation at the earliest opportunity.

Milk Industry

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the recent Milk Development Council report on the situation prevailing in the milk industry. [189918]

Alun Michael: We are still considering the findings of the report and hope that it will prove a useful step in helping to improve transparency in the dairy supply chain, which was a key recommendation in the recent EFRA committee report on milk pricing.

Ministerial Statements

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs for what reason all ministerial statements made by her Department are not published on the Departmental website as a matter of course on the day of their publication. [186725]

Alun Michael: We appreciate that there is a need for considerable improvement in the Defra website. Work is in hand on this.

Statements by Defra's Ministers are published on the departmental website as soon as possible—generally on the same day or the following day. We are reviewing our procedures to minimise the number of occasions when it is not possible for statements to be published on the same day.

New Homes (Water Prices)

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the impact of the Deputy Prime Minister's plans to build new homes upon water prices. [188288]

Mr. Morley: It is for water and sewerage undertakers to plan the provision they need to make for new development. Where new development takes place, the costs of connecting water and sewerage services are largely financed by the developers and the revenue streams from newly connected customers.

Where the growth of customer demand, whether from new or existing customers, cannot be addressed from existing supplies by measures such as demand management, leakage control and water efficiency, undertakers may propose new resources or infrastructure. If the case for this is accepted by Ofwat, the costs would be taken into account when setting price limits. Ofwat published its draft determinations of price limits for the period 2005–10 in August 2004. It will make its final decisions on 2 December 2004. There are well-established arrangements for dealing with cost pressures which arise between price reviews.

New Variant CJD

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what evidence has been found of a link between cattle born in (a) 2000, (b) 2001, (c) 2002 and (d) 2003, and new cases of nvCJD. [189625]

Mr. Bradshaw: Evidence of a link between BSE in cattle and nvCJD (now known as vCJD) in humans is based on the close similarities in disease patterns in mice infected with BSE and vCJD.

Although BSE has been confirmed in one cow born in the UK in 2000, no cases have yet been confirmed in cattle born after this date. There is still a great deal of uncertainty about the range of duration of the incubation period for vCJD, but there is evidence that it is substantial. Therefore, there is unlikely to be a direct link between BSE in cattle born in or after 2000 and any recent cases of vCJD.

Specified risk materials such as brain and spinal cord must be removed from all cattle carcases. If cattle were to be infected with BSE, this is estimated to remove over 99 per cent. of infectivity.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans she has to allow further imports of nuclear waste into the UK. [187735]

Mr. Morley: Government policy on the import of radioactive waste remains as set out in the White Paper "Review of Radioactive Waste Management Policy—Final Conclusions", Cm 2919. The general policy is that radioactive waste should not be imported to or exported from the UK except in certain specific circumstances. These include: (1) recycling to recover useful materials; (2) treatment to make subsequent storage or disposal of the waste more manageable, in cases where the processes are at a developmental stage or the quantities involved too small for the processes to be practicable in the country of origin; (3) spent sources manufactured in the UK and returned for recycling or disposal; and (4) waste from small users such as hospitals, situated in EU member states that have such small waste arisings that provision of their own facilities would be impractical, or in developing countries that could not reasonably be expected to acquire suitable disposal facilities.

All proposed imports of radioactive waste into the UK are subject to prior approval by the relevant competent authority, under the provisions of The Transfrontier Shipment of Radioactive Waste Regulations 1993.

Over-30 Month Cattle Scheme

Mr. Bill Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much was spent compensating for cattle of (a) three, (b) four, (c) five, (d) six, (e), seven, (f) eight, (g) nine and (i) 10 and over years in each year since 2000. [189626]

Alun Michael: The amounts spent on compensation in regard to cattle for each of the requested ages in each year since 2000 are set out in the table.

Parliamentary Questions

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what steps she is taking to ensure that the percentage of questions tabled for a named day reply answered by that day increases. [189615]

Alun Michael: I refer the hon. Member to my earlier answer to him of 29 April 2004, Official Report, column 1203W.

PFI/PPP Contracts

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many contracts her Department had with (a) Barclays, (b) Royal Bank of Scotland, (c) UBS Warburg and (d) Bank of Scotland for advice on private finance initiative and public private partnership contracts in each financial year since 2001–02; and what fees were paid in each case. [186660]

Alun Michael: From analysis of information held centrally, no contracts have been let and fees paid by the Department in each financial year since 2001–02 to Barclays, Royal Bank of Scotland, UBS Warburg or Bank of Scotland for advice on private finance initiative and public private partnership contracts.

Rural Payments Agency

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs whether a second wave of expressions of interest in voluntary exit from the Rural Payments Agency will be offered on similar terms to the first wave; and how many staff in each location took advantage of the first wave terms. [188712]

Alun Michael: The Rural Payments Agency (RPA) is committed to reducing the number of posts as part of its change programme which includes the implementation of the changes resulting from CAP reform. It has already ceased operations at three sites and a further two sites will be vacated in 2005.

Staff at those sites that are to remain open have been invited to express an interest in voluntary exit from the RPA to take effect by the end of 2006. They are being offered voluntary redundancy on compulsory terms.

The number of staff who have expressed an interest is broken down by location as follows.

Location	Number of staff
Newcastle	63
Carlisle	22
Exeter	66
Northallerton	31
Reading (including outstations)	222

There will be at least one further round of invitations for voluntary exit. This will target specific locations, grades and times linked to transition plans now being finalised.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on how many occasions in 2003–04 decisions were taken by the Rural Payments Agency to recover wrongfully made payments to farmers; and if she will list the 20 greatest sums involved. [189616]

Alun Michael: In the 2003–04 year the Rural Payments Agency has taken action to recover 299 payments that had resulted from administrative errors. The total value of these payments was £392,844.96 with the 20 greatest sums being:

	Value of payments (£)
	44,259.45

	3,552.37
Total	265,459.87

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many complaints were received from farmers by the Rural Payments Agency in 2003–04; and of those, how many (a) complained about the time taken to process claims and (b) elicited the response that claims by farmers had not been received. [189617]

Alun Michael: The number of complaints dealt with under the RPA's complaints procedure in 2003 and 2004 are set out below, these have been broken down into complaints regarding Integrated Administration and Control System (IACS) and non-IACS schemes.

Schemes	2003	2004
IACS	134	113
Non-IACS	21	25
Total	155	138

Notes:

1. Figures for calendar years.
2. 2004 figures as of 13 September.

The RPA could not extrapolate the data required to break these figures down into the requested categories without incurring disproportionate costs.

Scrapped Cars

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what her Department's estimate is of the number of cars in the UK scrapped each week; and if she will make a statement. [189923]

Mr. Morley: Estimates for numbers of abandoned vehicles removed and destroyed are compiled from the Defra Municipal Waste Management Survey. The estimates (310,100 for 2002–03) are collected on a yearly basis only.

Veterinary Services

Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of current (a) levels of preventable disease in UK farm livestock and (b) the provision of large animal veterinary services.

Mr. Bradshaw: The information requested is as follows:

(a) The Veterinary Laboratories Agency and Scottish Agricultural College publish the following disease surveillance reports:

Monthly disease surveillance reports in the Veterinary Record;

Annual national disease surveillance report (known as the VIDA report);

Annual report on Salmonella in livestock production; and

Contributions to the annual UK Zoonoses Report

In addition, the VLA produces quarterly retrospective reports for each of the major livestock species which are published on their website. These reports give a continuous indication of current levels of disease in UK farm livestock.

The concept of 'preventable' disease is complex and depends on 'cost and benefit' analyses as well as inherent characteristics of the various diseases. The Animal Health and Welfare Strategy Defra Publication No. PB9469 (published June 2004) and the UK Veterinary Surveillance Strategy Defra Publication No. PB8296 (published October 2003) describe a range of measures which are being implemented in partnership with stakeholders, in order to bring about a sustainable improvement in the overall health and welfare of our farmed livestock.

(b) Earlier this year we commissioned a report to investigate the issues surrounding the supply and demand of large animal vets. While there is much concern expressed about the closure of some rural practices and the future availability of veterinarians, there is also very clear evidence that many graduates are attracted to large animal work. We are committed to regularly monitoring the supply and retention of large animal veterinary surgeons in partnership with the RCVS to ensure that the profession can play a full and effective part in the implementation of the Animal Health and Welfare Strategy.

Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the non-legislative guidance issued by the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons precluding veterinary surgeons from offering their services to farmers with existing arrangements for emergency and clinical care of livestock; and if she will make a statement. [189603]

Mr. Bradshaw: The current guide to professional conduct issued by the Royal College does not preclude veterinary surgeons offering their services to farmers with existing arrangements for emergency and clinical care of livestock.

The Guidance for veterinary surgeons who are approached by new clients states:

> "Although both veterinary surgeon and client have freedom of choice, as a matter of professional courtesy and in the interests of the welfare of the animals involved a veterinary surgeon should not knowingly take over a colleague's case without informing the colleague in question and obtaining a clinical history.
> When an animal is initially presented a veterinary surgeon must ask whether it is already receiving treatment, and if so, when it was last seen, and then contact the original veterinary surgeon for a case history. It should be made clear to the client that this is necessary in the interests of the patient. If the client refuses to provide this information the case should be declined.
> In an emergency it is acceptable to make an initial assessment, and administer any essential treatment before contacting the original veterinary surgeon."

The Guidance for veterinary surgeons with mutual clients states:

> "Where different veterinary surgeons are treating the same group of animals, each may supply medicines for administration to those animals. Each must, however, keep the other informed of any examinations of the animals, relevant clinical information and medicines supplied or prescribed, so as to avoid any danger that might arise from conflicting advice or adverse reactions arising from unsuitable combinations of medicines.
> Even where two veterinary surgeons are treating different groups of animals owned by the same client, it is still advisable for each to keep the other informed of any problem which might affect their work."

Warm Front

Siobhain McDonagh: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many homes in Mitcham and Morden have benefited from the Home Energy Efficiency and Warm Front Schemes; and how much has been paid in grants (a) on average and (b) in total. [189335]

Mr. Morley: The Home Energy Efficiency Scheme is now marketed as Warm Front.

Since the beginning of the scheme in June 2000, approximately 1,360 households have been assisted, with a total expenditure of approximately £934,000 and an average grant of £684.

Watermark Project

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs whether her Department has joined the Watermark project. [188259]

Alun Michael: Yes. Defra joined the Watermark project in September 2001. In September 2002 additional sites were included on the project. The majority of Defra office sites are now covered by the Watermark project.

The project was established in 1999 by OGC buying solutions, to develop benchmarking and management information on water consumption across the public sector. The service includes online access to a computerised database containing benchmarks for different types of building to help public sector organisations compare consumption rates and develop realistic targets for reducing usage.

Defra does not use the Watermark data collection service, as it has had its own database on water consumption for some years. However we have made good use of the benchmarking service and a number of site surveys to establish water saving measures.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Disabled Facilities Grant

Mr. Cameron: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what plans he has to review, in conjunction with other departments, the operation of the disabled facilities grant. [190391]

Keith Hill: In response to a parliamentary question on 5 January 2004, Official Report, column 1, my right hon. Friend the Lord Rooker announced a review of the disabled facilities grant programme.

This review is now under way. Its terms of reference are to review the operation and outcomes of the disabled facilities grant programme and to make proposals to improve the efficiency and fairness of the provision of housing adaptations for disabled people.

A Steering Group has been established comprising officials from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the Department of Health and the Department of Education and Skills. The group also includes a wide range of experts from outside organisations involved with delivering housing adaptations and representatives of disabled people. A research study has also been commissioned from the School for Policy Studies at the University of Bristol to support the Group's work.

The Group will report to Ministers in May 2005.

Castle Point Borough Council

Bob Spink: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister for how long he has placed a head official from his Department in Castle Point borough council; and if he will list the names and job titles of the head official's direct support team. [189469]

Mr. Raynsford: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister has appointed a lead official, Anne-Marie Carrie, to work with Castle Point borough council. This appointment was made in July this year and is not for a fixed period. The lead official is supported by staff from the Local Government Practice Team of the Government Office for the East of England.

Council Housing

Mr. Purchase: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many council-owned dwellings under arm's length management organisation supervision have been brought up to the decent homes standard; and what the average cost is of such work in each region. [189651]

Keith Hill: Returns from local authorities and Arms Length Management Organisations (ALMOs) that have qualified for additional funding in Rounds one and two of the ALMO programme show a reduction of 43,000 in the number of homes that fail the Decent Homes standard between October 2002 and June 2004.

Work by ALMOs to bring homes up to the Decent Homes standard are funded from local authorities' existing resources and their additional ALMO funding. The extent and nature of the work required depends on the condition of each authority's stock and other local circumstances. The following estimates of the overall unit costs of such work are derived from data and forecasts from authorities in Rounds one and two of the ALMO programme and cannot be regarded as representative, especially where they are based on a sample of one or two ALMOs.

Forecast expenditure by Round one and two ALMOs to bring homes up to the Decent Homes standard

Region	Cost per unit (£)	ALMOs in sample
East Midlands	14,600	2
London	16,200	5
Yorkshire and the Humber	13,900	4
North West	11,600	4
North East	8,200	2
South West	9,800	1
East	5,600	1

Mr. Purchase: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister by what date all council-owned dwellings will meet the decent homes standard if the current rate of progress is maintained. [189652]

Keith Hill: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is on course to meet this target by the end December 2010.

Mr. Purchase: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister by what date he expects all council housing departments to reach the two star rating needed to qualify for additional borrowing powers. [189670]

Keith Hill: Local authorities can qualify for additional borrowing for expenditure on Decent Homes by setting up Arms Length Management Organisations (ALMOs) to manage and improve their housing stock. It is the ALMO that needs a two or three star rating from the Audit Commission to secure this additional funding. Of the 49 operational or proposed Arms Length Management Organisations on Rounds one to four the programme, 24 have already achieved a two or three star rating. Inspections of the others are scheduled to report between now and early 2006. Future Arms Length Management Organisations must achieve at least two stars within two years of becoming operational to qualify for additional funding.

Departmental Energy Efficiency

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will make a statement on energy efficiency in his Department's buildings. [185828]

Phil Hope: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is fully committed to improving the energy efficiency of the buildings on its estate. The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has recently published their Framework for Sustainable Development on the Government Estate energy targets, which the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has formally adopted as its own targets. Progress on these will be monitored on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's externally accredited Environmental Management System.

Domestic Violence (Leeds)

Mr. Battle: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what funding is available for work with perpetrators of domestic violence in Leeds. [189970]

Keith Hill: There are currently two projects in the Leeds area that deal with perpetrators of domestic violence. These are the Integrated Domestic Abuse Programme (IDAP) and the STOP project.

The Government take extremely seriously the effects that domestic violence has on the lives of victims. To help tackle this abhorrent crime the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill, was introduced on the 14 June 2004. This represents a radical overhaul in domestic violence legislation. This bill will ensure that victims get the help and protection they need. There will also be a victims fund that will put money into practical services that will help victims. Indeed £4 million from the proceeds of crime has already been dedicated.

E-Government

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how much expenditure his Department has allocated in each year since its establishment for public relations, marketing and publicity costs on e-government; and which external firms his Department has employed in relation to such activity. [188271]

Phil Hope: No separate allocation has been made for public relations, marketing or publicity costs on e-government. However, some of the funding from the local e-government programme has been allocated to support the dissemination of the products from the 23 National Projects, all led by individual local authorities, which have developed generic products and guidance on aspects of local e-government for all other authorities to use.

In addition, the London borough of Newham is acting as the lead authority on a project to provide a co-ordinated rollout of all the National Projects. The total budget for this project is £5.3 million. To help the authority carry out this work, the London borough of Newham has recently let a number of framework contracts to two private sector consultancies, Kaizo and Fishburn Hedges, to assist them to develop the communications strategy. These contracts were wrongly reported in the press as having been awarded by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

Fire Safety

Mrs. Helen Clark: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what changes he plans to make to the level of advice produced on house fire safety. [189979]

Phil Hope: Government home fire safety information and advice is widely disseminated and promoted in England and Wales through the campaigns of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's National Community Fire Safety Centre. The campaigns are developed in partnership with the Chief Fire Officers Association (CFOA) and are kept under constant review.

Mrs. Helen Clark: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the cost of employing consultants to deal with elements of work currently undertaken by staff in relation to fire safety (a) has been in this financial year and (b) is expected to be in 2005–06. [189980]

Mr. Raynsford: Staff, consultants and researchers are employed on a wide variety of projects connected to fire safety, for example in relation to home fire safety advertising campaigns, the revision of building regulations' Approved Document B, the preparation of guidance on the implementation of the Regulatory Reform Order, behavioural research and the evaluation of policy. The mix varies between project and project, and from time to time. The requested comparison could be made only at disproportionate cost.

Firebuy

Ann Winterton: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what strategy his Department has set in place for companies not currently within the Fire Service Procurement Association to be included in FiReBuy. [189915]

Phil Hope: EU Tender regulations and conditions of contract do not allow a re-engagement of any company who is currently outside the contractual arrangements without returning to a tender process. Current contracts, and the contract terms held by Fire Service Procurement Agency (FSPA), would be carried over and continue to operate under FiReBuy. Once the current contracts and their terms cease, any company would be eligible to re-tender along with other suppliers.

Firelink Communications System

Jim Knight: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the timetable for the remaining stages of the procurement and roll-out of the Firelink communications system. [190222]

Mr. Raynsford: As a result of a review of the project plan and timetable, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister expects to award the Firelink contract around the end of this financial year, and to complete roll-out during 2008.

Fires (Deaths)

Tom Cox: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many deaths in fires there have been in residential properties in the Greater London area in each of the last three years. [190252]

Mr. Raynsford: The number of deaths in dwellings fires in the London Fire and Emergency Planning Authority area are set out as follows:

Deaths reported in dwelling fires attended by the London Fire Bridgade

	2001–03
2001	68
2002	56
2003	[1]62

[1] (provisional figure)

Fraud

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what estimate his Department has made of the cost of fraud to (a) his Department, (b) the Executive agencies affiliated to his Department and (c) the Government offices of the regions in each of the last three years. [185776]

Phil Hope: Losses due to fraud in each financial year since the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister was created are as follows:

Financial year	The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (C)	Executive agencies	Regional Co-ordination Unit/ Government offices
2002–03	8,592	0	134,117
2004–05	0	0	0

With regards to thefts, mainly of assets, I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 27 July 2004, Official Report, column 751W. The figures include losses due to fraud by staff and external parties. The amounts for the Co-ordination Unit/Government offices include only those losses for which the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is accountable for. The Government offices are sponsored by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and nine other Departments, any losses on programmes delivered on behalf of the other Departments will have been reported to them. Recoveries from perpetrators have been netted off. Some incidents are still under investigation and final values may change.

Gypsies/Travellers

Mr. Battle: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister pursuant to his answer of 31 March 2004, Official Report, column 1501W, on gypsies/travellers, whether his Department's review of gypsy and traveller policy has been completed; and if he will make a statement. [190027]

Keith Hill: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's review of gypsy and traveller policy is nearing completion. Ministers will wish to consider the review's findings before making any further announcements.

Highway Installations

Bob Russell: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister (1) if he will list the categories of commercial organisations which are permitted to place installations on the highway; [187985]

(2) if he will require commercial organisations which are permitted to place installations on the highway to pay local authorities for such use; and if he will make a statement. [187986]

Mr. Jamieson: I have been asked to reply.

Section 137 of the Highways Act 1980 makes it an offence to obstruct a highway without lawful authority. The footway is part of a highway.

However, local authorities may license the following to be placed on or over the highway, and in each case there is provision for authorities to charge reasonable fees:

skips (section 139 Highways Act 1980

scaffolding (section 169)

erection of building over a highway (section 177).

In addition, section 115B of the 1980 Act enables a council to place objects or structures on a highway for the purposes of giving effect to a pedestrian planning order, enhancing the amenity of the highway and its immediate surroundings or providing a service for the benefit of the public. Section 115C enables a council to provide, maintain and operate facilities for recreation or refreshment or both on a highway. By virtue of section 115E a council may grant permission to a person to do what it has the power to do under sections 115B and 115C. In granting a permission under section 115E a council may, by virtue of section 115F, impose such conditions as they think fit, including conditions requiring the payment to the council of such reasonable charges as they may determine.

Historic Areas (New Buildings)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what steps he is taking to ensure the quality of new building in historic parts of the City of London. [190159]

Keith Hill: Responsibility for considering new buildings within the City of London rests in the first instance with the Corporation of London. In determining planning applications the Corporation are required to take account of the policies contained in their Unitary Development Plan and to also have regard to regional and national planning policy guidance. Policies of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister on the historic environment are contained in PPG15 and on design in PPG1 and draft PPS1.

Homelessness (Leeds)

Mr. Battle: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what his latest estimate is of the number of people homeless in Leeds. [189943]

Keith Hill: Information collected about local authorities' actions under homelessness legislation is in respect of households, rather than persons. The number of households accepted as eligible for assistance, unintentionally homeless and in priority need, as reported by Leeds city council during 2003–04, and April to June 2004, is tabled as follows.

	Households accepted as homeless[1] in Leeds
2003–04	4,948
April to June 2004	846

[1] Households eligible under homelessness legislation and found to be unintentionally homeless and in a priority need category

Housing Developments (Statutory Consultees)

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what plans he has to add water companies to the list of statutory consultees for new housing developments. [189995]

Keith Hill: The present, non-statutory arrangements for planning applications work satisfactorily. Potential problems with water supply or sewerage are already material considerations in planning cases. If the local planning authority considers that a development would give rise to a water supply or sewerage problem, the authority should consult the relevant water company. Where such problems cannot be resolved, the local planning authority should refuse permission for new housing.

Under the Town and Country (Local Planning) (England) Regulations 2004, which came into force on 28 September, water and sewerage undertakers are statutory consultees on development plan documents. This means that local planning authorities must take into account, when preparing their development plan documents, relevant strategic advice from the water companies.

Given the arrangements set out above, there are no plans to add water companies to the list of statutory consultees for planning applications.

Information and Communication Specialists

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many information and communication technology specialists are in full-time employment in the Department. [189591]

Phil Hope: The central Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's Information and Communications Technology (ICT) team is relatively small, staffed by 10 permanent full-time staff. However, there are a larger number of ICT staff distributed within the operational teams of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the changes have been in non-domestic rateable values in each English region, indicating the net change in rateable values by region; and what percentage of properties in each region will be (a) above the caps and (b) below the reduction limits in the proposed transitional scheme. [188709]

Mr. Raynsford: (a) The change in rateable value by region as a result of the revaluation for 2005 is as follows:

Region	Number of hereditaments	2000 rateable value (£)	2005 rateable value (£)	Percentage increase 2000–05
East of England	169,179	3,759,194,983	4,530,319,412	20.5

Non-domestic Rates

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister pursuant to his answer of 7 September 2004, Official Report, column 1164W, on non-domestic rates, how local authorities contribute to the decision-making process for distributions from the non-domestic rate pool. [189962]

Mr. Raynsford: There are two ways in which local authorities can contribute to decisions on distributions from the non-domestic rate pool.

The first is through the local authority representation on the Settlement Working Group. This is the main forum for discussions between officials and local authority representatives on the distribution of Revenue Support Grant and non-domestic rates.

The second is through the formal consultation which takes place after the Government have announced their grant distribution proposals for the coming year in the late autumn.

Recycling

Bob Spink: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the latest available 12 month figures are for the proportion of the Department's redundant documentation, waste paper and card that is recycled; and if he will make a statement on the Department's recycling policy. [188686]

Phil Hope: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's policy on recycling is to reduce waste through re-using and recycling and by using refurbished and recycled products and materials, wherever they meet business need and represent value for money.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister does not retain information on recycled paper in the format requested.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will soon be issuing it's first Greening Operations report which will be publicly available on both the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and Sustainable Development in government websites, a copy of this document will also be made available in the Library of the House.

Renewable Energy

Tony Cunningham: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when the companion guide to the Planning Policy Statement 22 on Renewable Energy will be published. [190122]

Keith Hill: Planning Policy Statement 22 was published on 9 August 2004. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister intends to publish the companion guide to the PPS later this autumn.

Smithfield Street, London (Planning Permission)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will initiate an inquiry into the planning permission granted to 12 Smithfield street, Smithfield in the City of London. [190160]

Keith Hill: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is not aware of any developments in relation to this address.

Smoke Alarms

Tony Wright: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will place an obligation on landlords to fit smoke alarms to their properties. [189870]

Phil Hope: Under proposals set out in the Housing Bill, local authorities will have new powers to license certain types of privately rented accommodation and licensing of larger houses in multiple occupation will become mandatory. It is proposed that it will be a mandatory requirement that smoke alarms are installed and maintained in proper working order in all licensed properties.

Guidance to local authorities and housing associations on smoke alarm installation in their existing stock was issued in 2001.

Tony Wright: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will place an obligation on those selling houses to ensure that smoke alarms are fitted. [189871]

Phil Hope: Under proposals set out in the Housing Bill, a duty will be placed on homeowners or their selling agents to provide a home information pack, including a home condition report. The home condition report covers health and safety risks. Consultation on draft guidance on preparation of the home condition report ended on 27 September and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is considering the responses.

The Government will continue to encourage all householders to install a working smoke alarm, whether or not the property is for sale.

Thurrock Urban Development Corporation

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what information is available (a) in printed brochures and other publicity and (b) on the internet and at what email address on the (i) function, (ii) membership and (iii) plans and proposals for Thurrock of the Thurrock Urban Development Corporation; and if he will make a statement. [190414]

Keith Hill: Thurrock Urban Development Corporation (UDC) has published its Baseline Study and its first Annual Report. The UDC is in the process of producing a brochure to explain its role, which will be distributed to stakeholders and made available on its website. The website—www.thurrockudc.org.uk—is due to go live before the end of October. Papers relating to the function and set up of Thurrock UDC can also be located on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's website at: www.odpm.gov.uk.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the (a) arrangements and (b) timetable are for the full funding of the Thurrock Urban Development Corporation; and if he will make a statement. [190415]

Keith Hill: Thurrock Urban Development Corporation (UDC) has been allocated an initial annual operating budget of £1.5 million. This will be reviewed at the end of the current financial year, by which time the permanent management teams should substantially be in place and the UDC will be better placed to judge its longer-term operating costs. By that stage the project plan and associated programme budget should also be in place.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he expects the Thurrock Urban Development Corporation to have (a) a postal address and (b) an office open to the public in Thurrock. [190416]

Keith Hill: The Urban Development Corporation can be contacted at:

Thurrock Urban Development Corporation, c/o ODPM Thames Gateway Delivery Office, 2 Exchange Tower, 10th Floor, Harbour Exchange Square, London E14 9GS.

The UDC Board is expected to consider the Business Case for its permanent location shortly.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the cause for the delay in announcing the Chief Executive of the Thurrock Urban Development Corporation is; and when an announcement can be expected. [190417]

Keith Hill: There has been no delay in the announcement of the arrival of the Chief Executive, which will be made imminently.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he expects to lay before Parliament the draft Statutory Instrument vesting planning powers in Thurrock Urban Development Corporation; and if he will make a statement. [190418]

Keith Hill: Thurrock Urban Development Corporation (UDC) has appointed consultants to assist in defining and establishing the Corporation's planning functions. The final report is due to go to the UDC's Board in November.

The precise timing of the Planning Order will depend upon the UDC having the necessary agency agreements with Thurrock Council in place and its own qualified staff to operate the powers.

Town Centre Regeneration

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether (a) Age Concern and (b) Victim Support are consulted on regeneration plans. [189236]

Phil Hope: The term 'regeneration plan' could refer to a wide spectrum of arrangements developed at a national, regional, sub-regional or local level. Consultation with stakeholders is integral to sustainable regeneration. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister does not issue a definitive list of organisations that must be consulted about regeneration. Guidance recommends that consultation should normally include the voluntary and community sector as well as representatives of local communities. Decisions about who to involve in particular cases are left to the partnership or agency which is leading on any regeneration scheme.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Early Growth

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many small businesses Early Growth invested in between its inception and March 2003; and if she will make a statement. [189806]

Nigel Griffiths: The first of the seven Early Growth Funds, London Seed Capital, launched in October 2002 and made one investment in the period to March 2003. Other Early Growth Funds launched during 2003–04. In the period to September 2004 over £4 million had been invested into 39 SMEs.

One objective of the Early Growth Funds is for them to demonstrate to future private investors that it was possible for commercial returns to be made by investing modest amounts into SMEs. The funds themselves will invest over a five to seven year period and performance to date has been within expectations.

Renewable Energy

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made in implementing recommendations made by the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee in March 2001 that incineration and other waste-to-energy technologies should not be regarded as renewable energy sources. [187068]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The EU directive on the promotion of renewable energy sources in the internal electricity market (2001/77/EC) defines the biodegradable fraction of energy from waste as renewable.

The Government carried out significant consultation on the support available to energy from waste through the Renewables Obligation—the main driver for the development of renewable energy in Great Britain—before deciding that the incineration of mixed waste should not be eligible for the Renewables Obligation.

The Government are however keen to stimulate the development of potentially cleaner and more efficient energy from waste technologies such as pyrolysis, gasification and anaerobic digestion. The proportion of energy, generated by these advanced conversion technologies, derived from the biodegradable fraction of waste, is eligible for support under the Renewables Obligation.

The Government have recently published the draft terms of reference for the 2005–06 Review of the Renewables Obligation. The Government do not propose to extend ROC eligibility to electricity generated from existing waste management projects which utilise conventional "mass burn" incineration technology. However the review will consider whether other options for waste management have emerged in the market which meet the goals of securing energy from wastes in efficient and environmentally beneficial ways and are consistent with the Government's wider waste management goals of increasing recycling and reducing the quantity of biodegradable MSW sent to landfill, as required by the EU landfill directive.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what Government aid and assistance is available to producers of each kind of renewable energy source. [189924]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government's main support mechanism for renewable energy is the Renewables Obligation. It provides the same level of support for the following sources: onshore wind; offshore wind; wave; tidal; geothermal; solar PV; all new hydro and refurbished older hydro of up to 20MW declared net capacity; landfill gas; sewage gas; electricity generation from biomass such as energy crops or forestry residues; co-firing of biomass with fossil fuels; and energy from mixed waste—however, only the non-fossil derived component is eligible and advanced conversion techniques such as pyrolysis, gasification or anaerobic digestion must be used.

£500 million of funding has also been allocated between 2002 and 2008 for emerging renewable technologies. It has been provided in the form of capital grants and funding for RD&D. Some examples of money already allocated include £117 million for round

1 offshore wind projects; around £66 million for biomass projects; £31 million for solar PV; £50 million for the Marine Renewables Development Fund, and approximately £19 million per year for industry lead RD&D.

£12.5 million of this has been allocated for the Clear-Skies programme, which has recently been extended to run for an extra year to 2006. This provides grants for domestic, community and not-for-profit schemes for the following renewable sources: small-scale wind, small-scale hydro, wood-fuelled boiler and heating systems, and solar thermal systems.

Solar thermal systems are also eligible for support, for commercial companies, under the Enhanced Capital Allowance scheme.

Renewable electricity is also exempt from the climate change levy. All renewable sources eligible under the RO are also eligible for this exemption with the following exceptions: only hydro-power up to 10MW in size rather than 20MW, and energy from municipal and industrial waste incineration without the need for advanced conversion techniques—but only for the proportion of waste that is biodegradable.

Renewable energy will also benefit indirectly from the introduction of the EU Emissions Trading Scheme in 2005.

Bank Holidays

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of the cost to businesses of (a) extra staffing costs incurred by working on bank holidays and (b) additional costs incurred through closing on bank holidays. [188827]

Mr. Sutcliffe: Unfortunately, we are unable to assess the cost to businesses for extra staffing costs incurred by bank holidays, and the additional costs for closing on bank holidays. This information will depend on the individual business and may be held by the businesses themselves.

Beer Prices

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what research her Department has carried out into the impact on the retail price of beer resulting from the market position of large pub companies. [186336]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The aim of the Office of Fair Trading (OFT) is to make markets work well for consumers and it is for the OFT to investigate if there is reason to believe that the market position of pub companies is harming competition. The DTI has not carried out research into the retail price of beer.

Bioenergy

Richard Younger-Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the progress of schemes which have been awarded under her Department's Bioenergy Capital Grants scheme. [187584]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The scheme is divided into priority sections each supporting a sector of the industry. £66 million was allocated to projects under the Bioenergy Capital Grants Scheme. This includes clusters of small heating boilers, Combined Heat and Power (CHP) and power generation.

Under priority areas la/lb/2 of the scheme, eleven power generation/CHP projects were offered grants with two having met the conditions for acceptance and now under construction. The remaining nine are all actively working toward fulfilling their grant conditions, with five having received planning permission and are in various stages of agreement on fuel supplies and power purchase agreements.

As of June 30, boilers had been installed under priorities 3a/3b representing over 5MW of capacity.

Renewable Power Stations

Nick Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether she intends to give smaller local power stations help towards construction. [185845]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government have no plans to give help towards the construction of small power stations but are providing support in a number of other ways.

The Renewables Obligation (RO) offers support to operators of renewable power stations (many of which are relatively small) by giving a premium value to generation from eligible renewable sources. The RO rules were amended in April 2004 to allow small generating stations with a capacity of 50kw Declared Net Capacity or less to accumulate output and be awarded Renewable Energy Certificates (ROCs) on the basis of their annual, rather than monthly, output, and we are proposing some additional flexibility in our current consultation paper on the Renewables Obligation Order 2005, published on 8 September.

The DTI-funded Clear Skies (www.clear-skies.org) initiative enables not-for-profit community organisations, including housing corporation, local authorities and schools to receive up to £100,000 for grants towards installing renewable technologies, which can include small renewable generating stations. Such projects give local communities a direct stake in renewables. An extension of this initiative for a further year was announced in September.

In addition, the Government are committed, under the Energy Act 2004, to developing a strategy within 18 months or so for the promotion of micro generation in the UK. Work has already started on the strategy, which will look specifically at promoting microgeneration from energy sources that help to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, including biomass.

Business Advisory Bodies (Funding)

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what identifiable results have been achieved as a result of funding from her Department for (a) the Manufacturing Advisory Service and (b) Corporate Venturing UK. [186346]

Jacqui Smith: The information is as follows:

(a) The Manufacturing Advisory Service has consistently met or exceeded its original performance targets and by the end of June 2004 the value added to companies through its interventions had reached £66.8 million. Almost 8,000 diagnostic visits had been made, followed by more than 1,800 in-depth assignments, while average productivity improvements are running at 30 per cent.

(b) The Corporate Venturing UK (CVUK) provides customer access to a confidential web based "shop window" that companies looking for corporate venturing opportunities can access to locate partners matching their requirements. Registered users promote opportunities and post details of the attributes they can offer and what they seek in a partner. CVUK has made good progress in promoting the concept of corporate venturing—through, among other things, conferences and setting up a marketplace for potential corporate venturing partners.

British Nuclear Fuels

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether her Department has made available resources to British Nuclear Fuels to provide loan guarantees to the company's Westinghouse subsidiary to work on new reactor designs in the United States. [187603]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Department has not made available resources to BNFL's subsidiary Westinghouse to provide loan guarantees for reactor design work in the US.

Citizens Advice Bureau

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what projections her Department has made for funding Citizens Advice Bureau in the UK. [189158]

Mr. Sutcliffe [holding answer 16 September 2004]: None. The DTI does not fund individual Citizens Advice Bureau anywhere in the UK. It funds the umbrella organisations for England, Wales and Scotland, but not Northern Ireland.

These charitable bodies set standards for advice giving, provide training, support and co-ordinate social policy work on behalf of the individual bureaux. Individual bureaux are each independent charities that raise funds from a number of sources including local authorities.

Civil Service Relocation

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many of the reductions in core civil service posts in her Department by 2007–08 proposed in Sir Peter Gershon's review of public sector efficiency will be relocated to sponsored agencies in the regions. [189808]

Ms Hewitt: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 21 July 2004, Official Report, columns 290–91W.

Correspondence

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the hon. Member for West Worcestershire will receive a reply to his letters to the Minister for Employment Relations, Competition and Consumers, of 17 June. [188012]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The Department of Trade and Industry has no record of having received the letter of 17 June 2004. The Department received a copy of this letter on 22 September 2004 and will respond within 15 days of that date.

Council of Ministers

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if she will provide a Written Ministerial Statement outlining the key points on the agenda for each of the Council of Ministers' meetings at which her Department is represented in advance of each meeting; [188204]

(2) if she will provide a Written Ministerial Statement outlining for each meeting of the Council of Ministers at which her Department is represented as soon as is practicable following that meeting (a) the key items of discussion, (b) the positions of the Government on those items, (c) the key positions taken by other member states that Ministers consider should be noted by hon. Members and (d) any preliminary discussion on the timing and the agenda of the following meeting. [188205]

Mr. Alexander: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to her question by my right hon. Friend, the Foreign Secretary, on 13 September 2004, Official Report, column 1451W.

Departmental Staff Survey

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will place in the Library a copy of the Department's Staff Survey 2003. [189807]

Ms Hewitt: I have today placed copies in the Libraries of the House.

Development Funding (Lancashire)

Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how much Government funding has been allocated for the Luneside East development in Lancaster; [189509]

(2) if she will breakdown funding for the Lancaster District Economic Development Zone by location; [189510]

(3) how much funding has been allocated to the Luneside East Economic Development Zone by (a) English Partnerships and (b) the North West Regional Development Agency; [189512]

(4) what progress has been made regarding the Luneside East Economic Development Zone; and if she will make a statement. [189513]

Jacqui Smith: The regeneration of Luneside East is being part funded through the £8 million European Regional Development Fund (ERDF) resources available to the Lancaster Economic Development

Zone. In addition to the £2.315 million ERDF, Luneside East has been allocated £4.56 million from English Partnerships and £3.01 million from the North West Development Agency.

Lancaster City Council is the key delivery organisation for Luneside East, and is currently in the process of engaging a lead developer to take this scheme forward.

Projects approved by the Lancaster Economic Development Zone partnership to date include:

	ERDF (£)
Heysham Industrial Access Improvements	460,000
Port of Heysham	350,000
4/5 Dalton Square, Lancaster	1,048,000
Luneside East, Lancaster	2,315,000
Storey Institute (Phase 1), Lancaster	65,000

A further £861,000 ERDF has been invested in a series of public transport and employment access activities across the EDZ area.

Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment the North West Regional Development Agency has made of economic development at the Lancaster West site in Heysham. [189511]

Jacqui Smith: The Northwest Regional Development Agency is aware of the Lancaster West site in Heysham, which has recently changed ownership. The RDA has invited the Lancaster Vision Board to submit proposals for economic development activities within its area and, if the Lancaster West site is nominated by the Vision Board, the RDA will undertake an assessment of its potential.

Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the preferred route is of the North West Regional Development Agency for the proposed Heysham Port/M6 Link. [189514]

Jacqui Smith: The Agency recognises that both the Heysham-M6 route options offer economic benefits to the region in that they will improve access to the strategic Port of Heysham, will help in the regeneration of Morecambe and will have measurable benefits on traffic levels in Lancaster city centre. The Agency is currently reviewing the recommendations of a number of economic and environmental studies on the two route options and will reach an informed view on the preferred option shortly, taking this work into account.

The selection of a preferred route for the proposed scheme is a matter for Lancashire county council.

Dinorwic Power Station

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much (a) energy and (b) carbon credit the operation at Dinorwic has saved in each of the last three years. [188943]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The last study to look into this was commissioned in 1999. The operation of Dinorwic pumped storage scheme has not changed since then.

The Primary Energy Savings:

From 1330 GHh per annum to 1590 GHh per annum—as reserve generation

From 534 GHh per annum to 668 GHh per annum—as TV pick-up

From -3811 GHh per annum to -1773 GHh per annum—as Peak Lopping

Carbon savings:

In the reserve generation role, Dinorwic can remove 140,000 tons of CO_2 per year

Discrimination

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans she has to propose extending anti-discrimination laws for gay men and lesbians to cover the provision of goods and services. [187134]

Jacqui Smith: The Government are aware of concerns about current imbalances in legislative provision for the different groups protected by discrimination legislation, which includes gay men and lesbians. One of the first tasks of the proposed Commission for Equality and Human Rights will be to review the legislative framework to ensure that it meets the needs of a modern Britain.

The Government are committed to improving equality and human rights for all in our society. This underpins our vision of a modern, fairer and more prosperous Britain. The creation of the Commission for Equality and Human Rights Commission will help create a more equal and cohesive society.

ECGD

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry under what circumstances the decision to convert the Export Credits Guarantee Department to a capitalised Trading Fund would be reversed; and if she will make a statement. [187093]

Mr. Alexander: In my statement to the House of 1 July 2004 on the future of ECGD I set out my objectives in establishing the framework for the ECGD Trading Fund, specifically that it should:

provide a structure for managing ECGD's business consistent with the current risk-reward balance and business domain;

help to improve risk management; and additionally that there should be transparent arrangements for reporting and accounting the economic costs to Government associated with ECGD's business.

The period of operating the Pilot Trading Fund from April 2005 will provide the opportunity to test the Trading Fund framework against these objectives and inform Ministers' decision on the move to the Statutory Trading Fund in 2007–08. That decision will be informed also by a consultation with customers on whether the pilot achieved its objectives.

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether her plans for restructuring the Export Credits Guarantee Department include job cuts in (a) 2005, (b) 2006 and (c) 2007. [189374]

Mr. Alexander: ECGD's recently appointed Chief Executive is currently assessing all areas of the business in which cost reductions can be achieved including, among other factors, necessary staffing levels. Such cost reductions will be needed to deliver lower premium rates to exporters, in line with my right. hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry's announcement of 1 July, Official Report, column 22WS.

UK Trade and Investment

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the definition of a registered customer for the UK Trade and Investment website services includes an individual or company that (a) has derived measurable benefit from this service and (b) has supplied registration details only on the website. [189371]

Mr. Alexander: UK Trade and Investment's definition of a registered customer for our website, www.uktradeinvest.gov.uk, is an individual who has supplied registration details. They will usually be associated with a UK business. Customers of the website are not required to report their business improvement position as a result of using the service.

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many of the UK Trade and Investment website's registered customers have reported a measurable increase in business improvement through their use of UKT&I services; and whether UKT&I is on track to increase the number of registered customers by 50 per cent. by 2006. [189372]

Mr. Alexander: UK Trade and Investment is on track to increase the number of registered customers by 50 per cent. by 2005. Customers of the website are not required to report their business improvement position as a result of using the service.

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many new exporters were developed with the assistance of UK Trade and Investment in (a) 2003 and (b) 2004 to date; and how many were small and medium enterprises in each case. [189373]

Mr. Alexander: During 2003–04 UK Trade and Investment assisted in the development of 1,912 successful new exporters (against a target of 1,908) all of which were small and medium enterprises. During the first quarter of 2004–05 the figure was 348 (against an annual target of 2,088 and against the results of the first quarter of 2003–04 which were 338).

Ford Car Production

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on discussions her Department has had with Ford Motor Company regarding Ford's future commitment to production in the West Midlands. [189443]

Jacqui Smith: Ministers and officials are in regular contact with the management of Ford Motor Company, as with other major manufacturers in the UK.

Jaguar's announcement on Friday 17 September, covering their plans for the Browns Lane site, is obviously disappointing, particularly given the efforts of the workforce to improve quality and productivity at Browns Lane. However, given the company's financial performance, tough decisions had to be taken. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has encouraged Jaguar's management to ensure that their workforce and trade unions remain informed and consulted, and that they discuss what steps might be taken to mitigate further job losses. It is important to note that no compulsory redundancies have been announced.

I am pleased that the company has taken the decision not to close Browns Lane Jaguar's Headquarters and administrative centre will remain in Coventry, as will the company's historic Wood Veneer Manufacturing Centre. And I am encouraged that the world leading R and D Centre at Whitely is being retained and welcome the employment opportunities for Browns Lane workers created by the growth and success at Aston Martin.

I hope that last Friday's announcement will help enable Jaguar to address its financial difficulties thereby securing a sustainable long-term future for the company, its products and its workforce here in the UK.

Mr. John Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on (a) the future of the Land Rover plant at Lode Lane, Solihull and (b) the future of the Jaguar plant at Browns Lane, Coventry. [189703]

Jacqui Smith: I welcome the news that the 'road map' for the Land Rover plant at Solihull has been agreed, and now ratified. I hope that all parties will now work together to achieve world-class productivity at the plant, and that it will have a successful future.

The decision to halt trim and assembly operations at Browns Lane has been a heavy blow to the workforce, their families and the surrounding region. It also broke the agreement the Company had with trade unions.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and Chancellor of the Exchequer have committed to raise the matter with senior Ford executives in the US. In addition, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has also written to the company to encourage them to further engage with all the stakeholders, and particularly the workforce through their trade unions and the local MPs.

Gas Prices

Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of the impact of the recent increase in the wholesale price of gas on large industrial users; and if she will make a statement. [189657]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: While the cost of gas to industry has been rising recently, this should be seen in the context of historical trends. In real terms gas prices for industrial users in 2003 were nearly 30 per cent. below their level in 1990 and well below their average over the last 30 years.

The Department is monitoring closely developments in the UK gas market and the recent increase in the wholesale price of gas. OFGEM has now announced its conclusions on its investigation into gas price increases in 2003 and 2004. It has concluded that the main causes of rising UK gas prices are record oil prices feeding into gas prices and declining UK gas supplies.

OFGEM is taking two courses of action. It is asking the European Commission to put more resources into making gas competition work, and is continuing to examine why some UK gas supplies did not reach the market.

Horse Racing (OFT Investigation)

Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her latest estimate is of the cost of the investigation by the Office of Fair Trading into British horseracing. [189816]

Mr. Sutcliffe: This is a matter for the Office of Fair Trading, which is the authority responsible for the enforcement of competition and consumer protection legislation in the UK, and I have asked its Chairman to respond to the hon. Member.

Insolvency

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the cost has been of the review of insolvency practitioners regulations. [189154]

Mr. Sutcliffe: [pursuant to the reply, 16 September 2004, c 1725–26W], I am afraid that because of an administrative error the information given in the reply was incorrect.

The cost to date is estimated to be £61,965.

Insolvency Service (Staff Numbers)

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, what the evidential basis was for the forecast increase in staff numbers at the Insolvency Service (a) to 1,600 in 2003–04 and (b) to 1,625 in 2004–05. [189785]

Mr. Sutcliffe: As from 1 April 2004 the Insolvency Service is operating under a new, net-running cost regime with fee income from insolvency cases covering the cost of administering those cases. Where case numbers rise the additional income produced enables additional staff resources to be engaged to deal with the increase.

Manufacturing Industry (London)

Linda Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assistance her Department gives to the manufacturing industry in London. [189140]

Jacqui Smith: The DTI recognises the contribution the manufacturing sector makes to both the regional and national economies. London manufacturers are able to access mainstream DTI business support products, which encourage increased competitiveness, productivity, investment and innovation. In addition, the London Development Agency, which is primarily funded by the DTI, is responsible for direct assistance to the London business community, including manufacturers.

In July 2004 we published a progress report on the Government's Manufacturing Strategy—the first such Strategy for 30 years—which highlighted the achievements made so far, including: establishing the Manufacturing Advisory Service, introducing the Research and Development tax credit, and providing substantial investment in the science base to promote innovation. We are working closely with industry, trade unions, and other stakeholders, in key areas of the Strategy to build a highly skilled and highly productive manufacturing sector.

The London Manufacturing Advisory Service (MAS) is a DTI initiative to help manufacturers to improve productivity and performance. Since April 2003, MAS have visited 389 London manufacturers. Those businesses that have reported back to MAS have shown average business savings of £157,800 and seen turnover increase by an average of £578,900.

Business Link for London, which is currently contracted by the DTI to deliver business support, helps manufacturers and other businesses by providing impartial, expert and practical advice to London's small and medium-sized companies.

Marine Aggregates

Adam Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the estimated amount in cubic metres of marine aggregates needed for domestic British construction purposes in each of the next 10 years. [188479]

Nigel Griffiths: The DTI does not produce forecasts separating marine-dredged from land-won or domestic from commercial.

Responsibility for consenting to the dredging of minerals from the English seabed rests with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

Marine Development Fund

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will give a breakdown of the beneficiaries of the recently announced marine development fund for renewable generation. [189910]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The new £50 million Marine Renewables Development Fund announced on 2 August, will be primarily focused on helping wave and tidal stream projects move forward from early demonstration towards commercialisation.

The Department is currently looking at possible mechanisms for administering the new funding and has not yet allocated any funds to individual beneficiaries.

Miners' Pension Rights

Mr Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many miners dismissed during the 1984–85 miners' strike applied for restoration of pension rights under the scheme launched in 2002–03; how many applications were successful (a) in the first instance and (b) on appeal; and how many cases are still under consideration. [190151]

Nigel Griffiths: I refer my right hon. Friend to the reply given on 29 June, Official Report, columns 194–95W.

Mobile Phone Warranties

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will carry out an investigation into the reliability of warranties for mobile telephones. [188605]

Mr. Sutcliffe: I have no plans to carry out an investigation into the reliability of warranties for mobile phones.

Under the Enterprise Act 2002, the Office of Fair Trading is responsible for investigating markets to see whether they work well for consumers.

National Assembly for Wales

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions she has held with the National Assembly for Wales Government on the proposals in its Technical Advice Note 8 consultation. [189212]

Mr. Mike O'Brien [holding answer 16 September 2004]: My officials have discussed the proposals in TANS with their counterparts in the National Assembly for Wales. Further discussions are planned.

The National Assembly for Wales is a member of the Sustainable Energy Policy Network taking forward the Energy White Paper. This provides a conduit for regular discussion on this and other issues around energy policy.

National Minimum Wage

Siobhain McDonagh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of the impact of the national minimum wage on employment in Mitcham and Morden. [189337]

Mr. Sutcliffe: In their last report (spring 2004) the Low Pay Commission stated that the evidence showed that the minimum wage had benefited many low paid workers, with negligible adverse effects on employment and inflation. Information on employment specific to Mitcham and Morden is not available.

Newsagents

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment has been made of the number of independent newsagents that have closed during the last 12 months. [188453]

Mr. Sutcliffe: Data on the number of independent newsagents that have closed during the last 12 months are not available from official sources.

Nuclear Decommissioning Authority

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the status of the EU Commission examination, in relation to State Aid issues, of the provisions relating to the establishment of the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority contained in the Energy Act 2004. [188776]

Mr. Mike O'Brien [holding answer 15 September 2004]: I refer the hon. Member for East Surrey to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Blanaeu Gwent (Llew Smith) on 14 September 2004, Official Report, column 1537W.

Nuclear Industry

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who authorised the public comments made by Adrian Gault on nuclear power; and whether they represent the policy of her Department. [189524]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State authorised the release on the DTI website of a large quantity of analytical work underpinning the Energy White Paper in February 2003. This included around 25 scenarios. There are different patterns of fuel use for electricity generation up to 2050 across these scenarios, which would all be consistent with a 60 per cent. CO_2 reduction. The Government's views on nuclear power remain as set out in the White Paper.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what estimate she has made of the amount of (a) processed and (b) unprocessed nuclear waste that will be stored in the UK in (i) one year, (ii) three years' and (iii) five years' time; and if she will make a statement; [187736]

(2) how much (a) processed and (b) unprocessed nuclear waste is being stored in the UK; at which locations it is being stored; and from where the waste originated. [187738]

Mr. Morley: I have been asked to reply.

An inventory of the radioactive waste currently held, and forecast to be held in the future, in the UK is compiled periodically (normally every three years) by my department and United Kingdom Nirex Limited (Nirex). This inventory statement, known as the UK Radioactive Waste Inventory, is a published document and it gives details of the waste in terms of volume, physical characteristics and chemical composition. It also provides information on the amounts of waste which are currently held in conditioned and unconditioned form, who is responsible for its management, and where it is stored.

There are over 30 sites at which waste is stored in the UK, the major site being Sellafield. Details of where waste originated from is not contained in the Inventory, and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. In general the waste currently held on sites is that which has arisen at the site, but there have been movements between sites over the years.

The last fully compiled Inventory, published in October 2002, is for a stock date (i.e data collection date) of 1 April 2001. Work to compile the next Inventory for a stock date of 1 April 2004 is currently ongoing, and the results will be published in 2005.

Figures for the stocks of UK radioactive waste given in the 2001 UK Radioactive Waste Inventory are:

	Stocks (m^3)
	HLW	ILW	LLW[1]
Not yet conditioned	1,619	64,227	14,425
Already conditioned	342	11,186	303

[1] Most LLW is usually promptly disposed of to the Drigg disposal facility.

Approximate estimates of future arisings derived from the 2001 Inventory, in terms of fully conditioned volumes, are:

Estimated conditioned volume of waste (m^3)
HLW	ILW	LLW

	Estimated conditioned volume of waste (m^3) HLW	ILW	LLW
1 April 2001	764	74,500	15,900
1 April 2004[1]	964	84,900	54,200
1 April 2007[1]	1,160	96,000	87,000
1 April 2009[1]	1,270	103,000	107,000

[1] Approximate estimates derived from 2001 Inventory figures.

Definitive 2004 figures will be provided by the 2004 Inventory results.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans she has to (a) recycle, (b) repatriate and (c) bury nuclear waste currently being stored in the UK. [187737]

Mr. Morley: I have been asked to reply.

UK radioactive waste owners are responsible for the future management of their waste, subject to securing the necessary regulatory approval from the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) and the environment agencies.

The Government's position on the future of reprocessing of spent fuel was set out in the July 2002 White Paper "Managing the Nuclear Legacy" (Cmd.5552). Magnox fuel is reprocessed for reasons given in the White Paper, and this should finish by around 2012. BNFL expects to complete their existing order book for THORP reprocessing by around 2010. Before making a decision on any proposal for new THORP contracts the Government would review it against the criteria set out in the White Paper and would consult publicly.

Government policy for the return of wastes from the reprocessing of foreign spent fuel is set out in the July 1995 White Paper "Review of Radioactive Waste Management Policy: Final Conclusions" (Cmd.2919). It is that the wastes arising from such reprocessing should be returned to the country of origin, and the high level radioactive waste (HLW) should be returned as soon as practicable after vitrification. The White Paper accepted that in appropriate circumstances this return policy can be implemented by waste substitution arrangements which ensure broad environmental neutrality for the UK. Substitution of HLW for low level radioactive waste (LLW) was permitted because of the availability of the LLW disposal facility at Drigg in Cumbria. Intermediate level radioactive waste (ILW) substitution was the subject of a Department of Trade and Industry consultation paper issued in January 2004, and the responses to this are currently being considered. All reprocessing contracts signed by BNFL since 1976 have included return of waste provisions, and these has been reinforced by exchange of intergovernmental letters. The programme of return of overseas reprocessing wastes is planned to begin in 2007–8.

The Drigg facility caters for the long-term management of LLW. Options for the long-term management of higher activity waste are currently the subject of consideration and evaluation by the independent Committee on Radioactive Waste Management (CoRWM). The long-term management policy for these higher activity wastes will be decided by UK Government and the devolved administrations in light of CoRWM's recommendations, due to be delivered in summer 2006. In the meantime the waste is stored safely under the regulatory surveillance of the HSE and environment agencies.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to the Answer of 11 February, Official Report, column 1478W, on nuclear waste, how much foreign spent nuclear fuel imported from abroad is stored at (a) Drigg, Cumbria and (b) elsewhere in the United Kingdom; what plans there are to send this spent fuel back to the countries of origin; and if she will make a statement. [189150]

Nigel Griffiths [holding answer 16 September 2004]: No overseas spent fuel received in the UK for reprocessing at Sellafield is stored at the Low Level Waste disposal facility near Drigg.

To date, approximately 10,000 meters cubed of Low Level Waste arising from the reprocessing of overseas spent fuel has been emplaced at Drigg.

The forecast volumes of conditioned High and Intermediate Level Waste at Sellafield to be returned to BNFL's overseas customers are approximately 305 metres cubed and 3,238 metres cubed respectively. The programme to return overseas high level reprocessing wastes is planned to begin in 2007–08.

Separately, the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority (UKAEA) has a very small amount of overseas Intermediate and Low Level Waste associated with its Research and Material test reactor, stored at Dounreay, Caithness for return to overseas customers.

Paper Industry

Jonathan Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of the impact of energy price rises on the paper industry. [189483]

Jacqui Smith: While the DTI has not at present made any detailed assessment of the impact of higher energy prices on the UK paper industry, the Government are very much aware of the concerns of Britain's energy-intensive manufacturing industries in particular and are monitoring the situation. More generally, in July 2004 the DTI published a "Review of the Manufacturing Strategy: Competing in the Global Economy" (http://www.dti.gov.uk/manufacturing/strategy_review.pdf), which sets out a framework and action plan for Government and industry stakeholders to create the right conditions for manufacturing success.

Parental Leave

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will reduce the length of time a parent must have been employed by a company before he or she becomes entitled to parental leave. [189739]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The Government are committed not to make any changes to the laws for working parents before 2006, after the impact of the existing legislation has been reviewed.

As part of its programme of work exploring what additional support could be provided to working parents while also meeting business needs, the DTI will examine a range of options.

Postal Scams

Jim Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures are being taken to ensure that vulnerable people do not become victims of postal scams. [189955]

Mr. Sutcliffe: DTI and the Office of Fair Trading (OFT) are working to raise consumer awareness of postal scams.

Most postal scams operate from outside the UK. The OFT works with the network of enforcement agencies called ICPEN (International Consumer Protection Enforcement Network) to investigate and take action against cross-border scams.

The OFT have taken a lead within Europe in taking action against scam mail under the powers provided by the Injunctions Directive and the Enterprise Act 2002 ('Stop Now Orders').

Regional Assemblies

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the proposed relationship between the regional development agencies and the regional assemblies in terms of control of public funding used to support businesses. [186349]

Jacqui Smith: The Government set up regional development agencies (RDAs) in the English regions in 1999 to co-ordinate the economic development and regeneration of the regions. The RDAs are the strategic drivers of regional economic development, working with regional and local partners and stakeholders to improve the performance of the regional economies. The RDA's activities include promoting business efficiency, investment and competitiveness in various ways. Details of these and other activities to further economic development and regeneration, skills and employment, are set out in their corporate plans, which are approved by Ministers.

As part of their policy for decentralising power and strengthening the English regions, the Government are providing for the establishment of elected assemblies in regions that want to take greater responsibility for the decisions that affect them. The Government published the draft Regional Assemblies Bill and accompanying policy statement on 22 July. As set out in the draft Bill, in a region where an elected regional assembly is created, the RDA will become a functional body of the assembly. The assembly will fund the RDA from its block grant, and the RDA will be accountable to the assembly, rather than to central Government, including for the public funding it uses for business support. It will be up to each assembly to decide the precise arrangements it puts in place for its working relationship with the RDA.

The RDA's business support activities will, as now, support the regional economic strategy, which the RDA will prepare for adoption by the assembly, subject to any modifications the assembly may wish to make.

Both the RDA and the assembly will be required to publish reports on their activities and expenditure.

Regional Development Grants

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what criteria are used to assess areas for regional development grants. [189230]

Jacqui Smith: The current Assisted Areas map was agreed with the European Commission in 2000, in accordance with the Regional Aid Guidelines and remains in force until 2006. It cannot be amended during that period without the agreement of the Commission.

The map identifies areas of acute labour market need and business opportunity, according to broad criteria established by the Commission. The UK map agreed in 2000 was constructed from electoral wards identified on the basis of four separate criteria: 'residence-based' (International Labour Office—ILO) and 'workplace-based' (Claimant Count) unemployment rates; manufacturing share of employment; and employment rates. These indicators were calculated from a series of ward—level information drawn from the 1991 Census, and the 1998 Labour Force Survey, Annual Survey of Employment and Claimant Count unemployment.

Regional Venture Capital Funds

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether all regional venture capital funds are operational; and on what dates they were launched. [189812]

Nigel Griffiths: All nine Regional Venture Capital Funds (RVCF) are operational, one in each English region.

East Midlands RVCF was launched in January 2002

North East RVCF was launched in January 2002

North West RVCF was launched in March 2002

Yorkshire and the Humber RVCF was launched in June 2002

London RVCF was launched in June 2002

South West RVCF was launched in October 2002

South East RVCF was launched in October 2002

West Midlands RVCF was launched in January 2003

East of England RVCF was launched in July 2003.

Renewable Obligation Certificates

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans she has to encourage greater use of renewable obligation certificates; and if she will make a statement on how the changes introduced in the Energy Act 2004 will work in practice in relation to the new mutualisation power. [189911]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Renewables Obligation provides suppliers with a strong incentive to acquire Renewables Obligation Certificates (ROCs) as suppliers who do not have enough certificates to meet their share of the Renewables Obligation have to pay the buy-out price for the remainder. The proceeds of the buy-out fund are then recycled to suppliers who hold ROCs, so that those suppliers paying into the buy-out fund are effectively subsidising those who use ROCs.

The Government's current consultation paper on a number of limited changes to the Renewables Obligation, which was published on 8 September, includes a proposal to increase the level of the Obligation from 10.4 per cent. to 15.4 per cent. over the period from 2010–11 to 2015–16. This measure is in response to calls from the renewable industry to give additional confidence for the period beyond 2010 and should encourage the development of renewables and therefore the use of ROCs. In addition, the forthcoming review of the Renewables Obligation in 2005–06 will include, among other things, an assessment of the effectiveness of the Renewables Obligation, including the extent to which the Obligation has led to new renewables projects coming forward.

The current consultation paper also sets out the Government's plans to give effect to the changes introduced in the Energy Act 2004 in respect of mutualisation. Where there is a shortfall in the Renewables Obligation buy-out fund, mutualisation will work by requiring each licensed supplier with a renewables obligation (excluding the defaulting supplier) to contribute an additional sum to make up the shortfall. These sums will form a separate "mutualisation fund" which will be redistributed to suppliers holding ROCs in the same way as the existing buy-out fund.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will break down how shortfalls in the Renewable Obligation Certificates Fund were made up in (a) 2003 and (b) 2004. [189912]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: In 2002–03, there were shortfalls in the Renewables Obligation buy-out fund totalling £23.6 million. This was the result of the failure of two companies—TXU (UK) Ltd. (which lead to a shortfall of £23.1 million) and Maverick Energy Ltd. (a shortfall of £0.5million). I understand that the administrators of TXU expect to make an interim payment to the affected suppliers very shortly.

It is too early to give precise figures for shortfalls in 2003–04, although I understand that two companies—Atlantic Electric and Gas Limited and Maverick Energy Limited—both of which are in administrative receivership will not have any funds available to comply with the Renewables Obligation. The resulting shortfall from Atlantic will be around £8.5 million and from Maverick some £0.7 million.

Sunday Trading

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans the Department has for evaluating the effect of Sunday trading on the family life of employees. [189578]

Mr. Sutcliffe: None. The Employment Rights Act 1996 provides an opt-out option for shop workers who do not wish to work on Sundays.

Tidal Renewable Energy

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much public money has been invested in renewable energy tidal sources in the current financial year. [189209]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government provide support for research and development in tidal stream technologies under the Department of Trade and Industry's Technology Programme. So far this financial year, £444,148 has been spent and a further £566,727 committed to this area under the programme.

Additionally, on 2 August Government announced a new £50 million Marine Renewables Development Fund. The new fund will be committed over the next three years and will support the further development of both tidal and wave technologies.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the main (a) goods and (b) services traded between the UK and (i) Finland, (ii) Sweden, (iii) Norway, (iv) Denmark and (v) Iceland were in the last period for which figures are available. [189243]

Mr. Alexander: Information on the UK's trade in goods with the Nordic countries is given in the following table.

A breakdown of the UK's trade in services with these countries is not available.

Cancer Services

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average cost is of an operation for breast cancer in the NHS. [189553]

Mr. Hutton: Data are collected on the average cost of a number of procedures on the breast but are not broken down into categories allowing the identification of those procedures specific to cancer.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans the Government have to expand preventative policies to combat cancer, with particular reference to reducing liability to environmental hazards by tighter regulations and better application of the precautionary principle. [188392]

Miss Melanie Johnson: With reference to reducing liability to environmental hazards through regulation, the regulatory roles lie with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Defra) and the Department of Trade and Industry. The role of the Department of Health is to advise these other Government Departments on the risk of adverse human health effects from chemicals in the environment. The regulations are developed to prevent adverse effects, including cancer, in humans.

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice he has given to the Mid-Anglia Cancer Network to publish an overall plan for the provision of cancer services and specialist treatments based in hospitals at Chelmsford, Colchester and Ipswich; and if he will make a statement. [190042]

Dr. Ladyman: The Department has not issued any advice to the Mid Anglia Cancer Network (MACN) to publish an overall plan for the provision of cancer services. In line with our policy of "Shifting the Balance of Power", the configuration of local health services is a matter for the local national health service, working in partnership with its local community. It is for local NHS organisations, with their knowledge and expertise, to plan and develop services, based on that knowledge. I understand that the MACN will make a final decision about the future configuration of cancer services at its next board meeting in November.

Care Homes (Funding)

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much funding his Department made available for care homes in (a) the London borough of Havering, (b) each other London borough and (c) each strategic health authority in each of the last five years. [189248]

Dr. Ladyman: Neither councils nor strategic health authorities are allocated funding to be spent on care homes in particular. It is for councils and strategic health authorities to decide in the light of local circumstances and priorities how much of the general funding that they receive should be spent on care homes.

The Government have provided additional resources for social services. Between 1996–97 and 2002–03 the Government have increased funding by about 20 per cent. in real terms, an average of 3 per cent. per annum and will continue to increase resources until 2005–06 by an average of about 6 per cent. per annum in real terms.

The Government have also made additional revenue resources available to the national health service. Since 1999–2000, the first year of unified allocations, funding has grown from some £31 billion to over £49 billion for 2004–05. From 2003, as part of shifting the balance of power, three-year allocations have been made direct to primary care trusts (PCTs) for the first time. PCTs received average increases of 30.83 per cent. in funding for the period covering 2003–04 to 2005–06.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received from the London borough of Havering on funding for care homes; and what his response was. [189250]

Dr. Ladyman: We have had no representations from the London borough of Havering on funding for care homes.

Carers

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans his Department has to improve practical support to carers of family members at home; and if he will make a statement. [189920]

Dr. Ladyman: This Government are the first ever to recognise the contribution and concerns of carers. They developed the national carers strategy in 1999 with carers and the organisations that represent them.

The Carers Grant was introduced in 1999 to support councils in providing breaks and services for carers in England. The grant has been increased annually and has provided an extra £325 million over the last five years. It is worth £125 million this year and will continue at least until 2005–06, by which time it will be £185 million.

The Carers (Equal Opportunities) Act received Royal Assent on 22 July 2004. The Act will ensure that carers are able to take up opportunities which those without caring responsibilities take for granted.

The office of the Deputy Prime Minister launched the Beacon council scheme on 7 July 2004. Supporting carers is one of the themes for the forthcoming round.

To support carers' access to information, the Department is funding Carers UK to provide advice and information in a variety of formats.

CHCs

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many premises are owned or leased by community health councils; and how many are (a) occupied and (b) unoccupied. [187755]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Following the abolition of community health councils on 1 December 2003, the responsibility for community health council premises transferred to NHS Estates, therefore no premises are owned or leased by community health councils. 115 premises are awaiting assignment to national health service organisations, other tenants or are awaiting sale. None of these premises is currently occupied.

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what community health council buildings have been disposed of since 1997. [187756]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The following community health council offices have been disposed of since 1997:

Blackburn

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the total amount of (a) rent and (b) other costs being paid by community health councils since their abolition. [187757]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The estimated costs of rent on former community health council premises is £1.142 million. This is mainly due to outstanding leases. It is expected that the remaining 69 properties will be disposed of by the end of this financial year.

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the locations of former community health council offices where rent is still payable. [187761]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Rent is still payable on the following former community health council offices:

Blackpool, Manchester South, Manchester Central, Manchester North, Halton, Warrington, East Yorkshire, North Durham, Rotherham, Sunderland, Bassetlaw, Central Lincolnshire, Bristol, East Dorset, Gloucestershire, Salisbury and District, Somerset, Isle of Wight, Portsmouth, Bromsgrove and Redditch, Shropshire, Solihull, South Birmingham, South Warwickshire, Barnet, Bexley, Brent, Bromley, Camden, City and Hackney, Ealing, Enfield, Greenwich, Hammersmith and Fulham, Haringey, Hillingdon, Hounslow, Islington, Kensington, Chelsea and Westminster, Lambeth, Lewisham, Merton and Sutton, Newham, Redbridge, Richmond, Twickenham and Roehampton, Tower Hamlets, Waltham Forest, Hove, Canterbury, Gravesend, East Berkshire, Eastbourne, East Surrey, Maidstone, Hastings, Medway, Oxfordshire, South East Kent, Tunbridge Wells, Worthing, North Bedfordshire, North West Hertfordshire, North East Essex, Southend and District, West Essex, Mid Essex, Basildon and Thurrock, West Suffolk and East Hertfordshire.

This is mainly due to outstanding leases. It is expected that the remaining properties will be disposed of by the end of this financial year.

Continuing Care

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will reassess his estimate of the cost of providing free personal care with reference to (a) the latest Laing and Buisson survey for March 2003, (b) the current review of eligibility for NHS continuing care and (c) changes to the amount of funding for free nursing care since January 2004. [187861]

Dr. Ladyman: No, the estimate of the cost of providing free personal care will not be reassessed. None of these changes would materially affect our estimate of providing free personal care.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the cost in each year until 2009–10 of providing NHS continuing care for those people previously denied it until the review of eligibility criteria this year. [187862]

Dr. Ladyman: My written statement of 22 June 2004 specified that the National Health Service expects to pay a total of over £180 million in restitution payments to those previously wrongly denied NHS continuing care, and that this amount has been added to NHS budgets. No data are held centrally on the proportion of these cases which relate to people living today, nor what the likely life expectancy might be of those who remain alive today. In the absence of this information, no meaningful estimate of costs can be made.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what amount his Department has allocated to strategic health authorities (a) to cover the costs of reviewing their eligibility criteria for NHS continuing care and (b) for compensating those people who were wrongly denied continuing care over the past seven years. [187863]

Dr. Ladyman: My written statement of 22 June 2004 specified that the National Health Service expects to pay a total of over £180 million in restitution payments and that this amount has been added to NHS budgets. The review of eligibility criteria is part of the NHS' management of services and was managed within NHS budgets.

Contraceptive Services

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the rules are for the prescribing of contraceptives services for people under the age of 16; and if he will make a statement. [188907]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) on 4 October 2004, Official Report, column 1947W.

Dementia

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the annual cost of providing nursing and personal care for dementia sufferers in England. [187798]

Dr. Ladyman: Since April 2003, everyone who requires care from a registered nurse will have received free of charge either direct national health service nursing care from the community nursing service or NHS funded nursing care.

The estimated cost of providing free personal care in England for those with dementia would be in the region of £1 billion. The estimated cost of providing free personal care in England for everyone with a need for personal care would be about £1.5 billion. The total gross expenditure on means tested social services for all adults in 2002–03 was £9.5 billion; net expenditure (after deducting fees and charges) was £7.5 billion.

Dentistry

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether it is his policy that dentists from other European Economic Area countries should be required to undertake a vocational training year in the same way as UK dentists before being permitted to practise in the UK. [188035]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Yes, and we take every opportunity to advocate the benefits of vocational training in our contacts with the European Commission and the health departments of those Member States which do not have schemes. The need arises because the Dentists Directive 78/686/EEC entitles holders of qualifications meeting the standards set out in the Directive to automatic recognition throughout the European Economic Area. Member States cannot impose additional training requirements.

We are currently recruiting additional dentists to improve access to National Health Service dentistry. Where they are to appoint overseas dentists, Primary care trusts offer induction training which covers key items within the vocational training curriculum.

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the total cost to the NHS of dental services was for each primary care trust in the Surrey and Sussex strategic health authority in each year since 1997. [188174]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The cost to the national health service of general dental services (CDS) in Surrey and Sussex strategic health authority area is shown in the table. This covers payments to GDS dentists less patient charge contribution.

Personal dental services patient charges were introduced in October 1998. The first PDS patient charges in this area occurred in 1999–2000.

Departmental Satellite and Cable

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what the cost to the taxpayer was of satellite and cable subscriptions in his Department's buildings; [185862]

(2) if he will list the premium channels that his Department subscribes to. [185863]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Department's building at 79 Whitehall (Richmond House) is connected by cable link to the parliamentary annunciator system from the Palace of Westminster. This link was in place when Richmond House opened in 1988, having first been established in 1969 in a previous headquarters building. The purpose of this is to provide Ministers, their Private Offices and other staff access to debates in the House of Commons and the House of Lords. Currently, this system is free of charge and comes in the form of a package of 24 audio and visual channels, which provide access to a range of broadcast services in addition to the parliamentary channels. Of these, Sky Sports is the only service which would be categorised as a premium channel. Separate from this, the Central Office of Information also provides a link for viewing the parliamentary committee broadcasts, at a current annual cost to the Department of £27,739.40, including VAT.

In her reply to a similar question from the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) on 23 April 2002, Official Report, column 241W, my hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Ms Blears) attributed this separate charge to the provision of the annunciator system.

This was based on wrong advice, arising from a misunderstanding at the time about the operation of the system. I have written to the hon. Member apologising for the mistake and drawing his attention to this reply. A copy of that letter has been placed in the Library.

Domiciliary Care

Andrew Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the availability of domiciliary care. [189207]

Dr. Ladyman: Since 1997, the number of contact hours of domiciliary care have increased from 2.6 million to 3.1 million in 2003. More people are being kept out of residential care through the provision of intensive care packages in their own home. The number of households receiving intensive support at home has increased from 60,700 at September 1998 to 87,000 at September 2003.

In 2004–05, total social services resources for adults increased to £10.3 billion, or £775 million more than 2003–04, an increase of 8.2 per cent. in cash terms or about 6 per cent. in real terms. It is for local councils to decide how much of this funding is spent on domiciliary care.

Eating Disorders

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 14 September 2004, Official Report, column 1498W, on eating disorders, what information he collates on waiting times for in-patient and out-patient treatment for eating disorders. [189841]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Information on waiting times, which is available at http://www.performance.doh.gov.uk/waitingtimes/, for in-patient and out-patient treatment in England is collected by consultant specialty rather than for specific conditions. This means that the information is not available in the format requested. However, we are aware that waiting times for treatment for eating disorders are sometimes too long and this is why we asked the National Institute for Clinical Excellence to develop a guideline on the effective treatments and why the national director for mental health is developing guidance for commissioners of specialised services.

Female Doctors

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many female doctors are employed in the NHS; and at what level (a) in real terms, (b) as whole time equivalent and (c) as a percentage of all doctors. [189397]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is shown in the following table.

General Practitioners

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the average list size of general practitioners in (a) England, (b) each strategic health authority and (c) each primary care trust for each year since 1997. [187865]

Mr. Hutton: The average general practitioner list sizes in England for each year from 1997 to 2003 by strategic health authorities and primary care trusts have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average general practitioner list size is in (a) Hartlepool Primary Care Trust and (b) England. [189264]

Department of Health General and Personal Medical Services Statistics

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list the 10 primary care trusts with the lowest number of general practitioners per 100,000 population; [189262]

(2) how many general practitioners per 100,000 population there are in (a) Hartlepool Primary Care Trust and (b) England. [189265]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 16 September 2004]: As at March 2004, there were 52.6 general practitioners (GP) (excluding retainers, registrars and locums) per 100,000 weighted population in Hartlepool Primary Care Trust (PCT) compared to 63.6 GPs (excluding retainers, registrars and locums) per 100,000 weighted population in England.

The 10 PCTs with the lowest number of GPs (excluding retainers, registrars and locums) per 100,000 weighted population as at March 2004 are as follows:

Doncaster, West
Thurrock
Eastern Hull
Easington
Barking and Dagenham
Walsall
Barnsley
Oldham
North Stoke
Ashton, Leigh and Wigan

All figures are based on headcount.

GP Surgeries (Disabled Access)

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to provide funds to improve access to general practitioner surgeries for disabled people; and if he will make a statement. [189996]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Department recently announced an additional £108 million over two years for improving general practitioner premises. This money can be used to meet the requirements of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, including the new access provisions commencing 1 October 2004. The use of this money will however be subject to local decision-making and prioritisation.

The Department and the Disability Rights Commission last month issued joint guidance for the primary care sector aimed at raising awareness of the duties under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 and improving disabled people's experience of primary care services.

Head Injuries

Dr. Richard Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of district general hospitals accepting patients with head injuries have a consultant who has undergone higher surgical training in the management of head injuries. [189453]

Mr. Hutton: Information on the staffing profile of district general hospitals and the training undergone by individual consultants employed in them is not held centrally. Central monitoring and reporting is limited to that concentrated on the information needed to demonstrate progress against the targets set out in "National Standards, Local Action: Health and Social Care Standards and Planning Framework 2005–06 to 2007–08"—published by the Department on 21 July 2004; and for contractual purposes. Additional monitoring is kept to a minimum in favour of local performance management systems, exception reporting and independent inspections.

All doctors are expected to comply with the guidelines of the General Medical Council about providing care. They must recognise and work within the limits of their own professional competence and refer a patient to another practitioner, when appropriate.

Hepatitis C

Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department is taking to verify the accuracy of estimates of the percentage of the population with hepatitis C. [189817]

Miss Melanie Johnson: As part of the "Hepatitis C Action Plan for England", the Health Protection Agency is strengthening epidemiological surveillance of hepatitis C infection to provide better estimates of its prevalence and incidence in the general population and injecting drug users.

Hernia Operations

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average cost of a hernia operation is on the NHS. [189549]

Mr. Hutton: The national average unit cost (per operation) for all national health service trusts in England for inguinal, umbilical or femoral hernia repairs, where the operation is undertaken electively (that is not as an emergency) is as follows:

As an in-patient:

For patients who are more than 69 years old or with complications or co-morbidities—£1,247

For patients who are less than 70 years old without complication or co-morbidities—£1,066

As a day case procedure:

For patients who are more than 69 years old or with complications or co-morbidities—£701

For patients who are less than 70 years old without complication or co-morbidities—£729

The data source is the reference costs 2003 collection, relating to the financial year 2002–03. This is the most current data available and is accessible on the Department's website at: http://www.dh.gov.uk/PublicationsAndStatistics/Publications/PublicationsPolicyAndGuidance/PublicationsPolicyAndGuidanceArticle/fs/en?CONTENT_ID = 4070195&chk = UzhHA3

Calculation of the costs provided are based on all activity and costs associated with each procedure, regardless of the speciality in which the activity is recorded.

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many inguinal hernia operations were carried out by the NHS in each of the last three years. [189550]

Mr. Hutton: The number of finished consultant episodes for the years 2000–01 to 2002–03 for Office of Population Censuses and Surveys 4 codes T19 to T21 (hernia operations) is as follows:

	Number
2000–01	84,003

Note:

Finished Consultant Episode: Finished consultant episode (FCE) is defined as a period of admitted patient care under one consultant within one health care provider. The figures do not represent the number of patients as a person may have more than one episode of care within the year.

All operations count of episodes: These figures represent a count of all FCEs where the procedure was mentioned in any of the 12 (four prior to 2002–03) operation fields in a Hospital episode statistics record. A record is only included once in each count, even if an operation is mentioned in more than one operation field of the record.

Grossing: Figures are grossed for both coverage and missing/invalid clinical data, except for 2002–03 which are not yet adjusted for shortfalls.

Maternity Services

Mrs. Helen Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps is he taking (a) to maintain the number of midwives and (b) to maintain the number of those available (i) for home births, (ii) to fill existing vacancies and (iii) to cover those unable to attend work. [187558]

Mr. Hutton: The Government are implementing a range of measures to recruit and retain midwives. These include improving pay and conditions, encouraging the national health service to become a better, more flexible and diverse employer, increasing training, investing in child care and continuing professional development, attracting back returners and running national and international recruitment campaigns.

In September 2003, there were 1,556 more midwives employed in the NHS than there were in 1997 and the number of students entering training to become a midwife each year has increased by 574 or 34 per cent. since 1996–97.

In line with the Government's policy to devolve decision making to those at the front line of NHS service provision, it is for individual units and trusts to make arrangements for covering home births and to cover for staff absences.

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list, for each NHS organisation providing maternity services, the latest available figures for (a) vacancies for midwifery grades (i) in numerical terms and (ii) expressed as a percentage of total number of posts at those grades and (b) numbers of (i) home births and (ii) caesarean sections performed, expressed in each case (A) in numerical terms and (B) as percentages of total births. [188905]

Dr. Ladyman: The information available on vacancies for midwifery grades has been placed in the Library.

Information on the numbers of home births and caesarean sections performed is not available in the format requested. Hospital episode statistics data show that, in 2002–03, there were an estimated 12,100 home deliveries (2.16 per cent. of total deliveries) and 117,800 caesarean deliveries (21 per cent. of total deliveries) in England. Percentages for caesarean sections compared to total hospital deliveries are available by hospital in Table 33 of the NHS Maternity Statistics, England, 20O2–03 bulletin. A copy of the bulletin is available in the Library.

Kidney Dialysis

Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether Saudi Arabia is among those countries with which the UK has reciprocal arrangements for providing kidney dialysis for patients travelling abroad. [189527]

Mr. Hutton: The United Kingdom has reciprocal treatment arrangements with a number of countries outside of the European Economic Area. There is currently no reciprocal arrangement with Saudi Arabia.

Meat Consumption

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to reduce the amount of (a) red meat and (b) white meat consumed; and if he will make a statement. [188082]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Government recognise the contribution meat can make to a healthy balanced diet and have no plans to take specific action to reduce meat consumption. They are however, taking a number of steps to encourage people to eat a healthier diet, which includes advising moderate consumption of meat and encouraging people to choose leaner cuts and remove visible fat and poultry skin.

Mental Health

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many incidents of (a) sexual assault on and (b) sexual harassment of mental health in-patients have been reported in each of the past 10 years; and how many of these incidents resulted in criminal or civil proceedings. [188861]

Ms Rosie Winterton: This information is not centrally available.

National health service trusts need to ensure that all patients are protected from physical, psychological or sexual harm while they are being treated in mental health facilities. As set out in Safety, Privacy and Dignity in Mental Health Units (2000), an officer at a senior level within the trust should be appointed to have responsibility for women's safety, privacy and dignity. Speedy and robust arrangements must be in place to deal effectively with staff or patients who sexually abuse or harass patients, staff and visitors. Whether there is a complaint or not, all incidents of women patients being threatened, pestered or harassed should be investigated, recorded and reported to the responsible officer for monitoring purposes.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the types of bodies through which mental health service users are able to influence the development and delivery of mental health services; and in which trusts such bodies operate. [188862]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Government established patients' forums for all primary care trusts and national health service trusts, including mental health trusts. Forums comprise volunteer members of the public, and include patients of the trusts for which the forums are established. Forums feed the views and experiences of patients and the public into the operation and management of services. Patients' forums make reports and recommendations to the boards of the trusts and can also refer matters of concern to the healthcare commission, local authority overview and scrutiny committees, strategic health authorities, or any other body they deem appropriate.

"Mental health policy implementation guide on adult acute inpatient care" (2002), which is available in the Library, recommends the establishment of acute care forums with involvement of service users and carers to agree and regularly review the operation and co-ordination of the range of acute care services.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of Mind's Ward Watch report; and if he will make a statement. [188864]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Department is committed to ensuring patients' safety, privacy and dignity in all inpatient settings and understands that some people in psychiatric wards may not always feel that ward environments are conducive to their recovery.

We value every opportunity to study and take into account any new evidence and welcome working in close collaboration with Mind on this issue.

The Department has given a strong public commitment to protect patients' privacy and dignity and to achieve single sex hospital accommodation in all national health service hospitals. By December 2003, 99 per cent. of NHS trusts provided single sex sleeping accommodation for planned admissions and had robust operational policies in place to protect patients' privacy and dignity; 99 per cent. of them met the additional criteria to ensure the safety, privacy and dignity of people who are mentally ill; and 97 per cent. provided properly segregated bathroom and toilet facilities for men and women.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the cost was of the report commissioned by the Surrey and Sussex Strategic Health Authority into the death of Sarah Lawson in Worthing; and what the cost of legal advice to the Surrey and Sussex Strategic Health Authority in respect of the report was. [189444]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Department does not have the requested information.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how he plans to monitor the progress of recommendations made in the report into the death of Sarah Lawson on improvement of mental health services in West Sussex; [189445]

(2) what action he plans to take to implement in England the recommendations of the report on the death of Sarah Lawson in respect of mental health services. [189446]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The report on the death of Sarah Lawson was commissioned by the former West Sussex health authority, and carried forward by the Surrey and Sussex strategic health authority. It is therefore the responsibility of the Surrey and Sussex strategic health authority to ensure that local recommendations are fully considered, and acted upon.

However, the Department will consider and respond to any national recommendations.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether epilepsy is included in the definition of mental disorder in the Draft Mental Health Bill; and if he will make a statement. [190007]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Under the Bill, mental disorder means

> "an impairment of or a disturbance in the functioning of the mind or brain resulting from any disability or disorder of the mind or brain".

Having a condition which falls within this definition cannot, on its own, lead to a person being detained or treated under compulsory powers. The powers in the Bill can only be used where the carefully drawn conditions are all satisfied. The conditions require that the patient is suffering from a mental disorder which is serious enough to warrant specialist treatment under the care of a senior mental health practitioner; the risk to self or others justifies use of compulsory powers and appropriate treatment is available for the individual patient taking into account all the circumstances of the case.

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will make it his policy to provide further funding to the North West Surrey Mental Health Partnership NHS Trust to support the retention of respite care beds at Kingscroft, Staines; [189776]

(2) if he will make it his policy to block the proposals of the North West Surrey Mental Health Partnership NHS Trust to close respite care beds for sufferers with learning difficulties and mental health problems at Kingscroft, Staines. [189777]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Following the Department's "Shifting the balance of power" initiative, funding is allocated to primary care trusts (PCTs) on the basis of the relative needs of their populations. It is for PCTs, in partnership with strategic health authorities and other local stakeholders to determine how best to use their funds to meet national and local priorities for improving health, tackling health inequalities and modernising services.

The configuration of local health services including the provision of respite care beds is a matter for the local National Health Service, working in partnership with its stakeholders and the local community. It is for NHS organisations to plan and develop services based on their specific local knowledge and expertise.

Myasthenia Gravis

Mr. Martin Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will make a statement on Government support provided to those diagnosed with myasthenia gravis; [188628]

(2) what plans his Department has to increase awareness of the condition myasthenia gravis amongst the medical profession; [188632]

(3) if he will make a statement on support provided by Government to the families of people who are diagnosed with myasthenia gravis. [188743]

Dr. Ladyman: Although there is no cure for myasthenia gravis there are a number of treatments available to help control it. These include medication, surgery, and palliation. It is for strategic health authorities in partnership with other local stakeholders to determine how best to use their funds to provide health services for their populations, including those with myasthenia gravis, with independent inspection to ensure that patients have access to appropriate services.

The national service framework for long-term conditions will focus on improving services for people with neurological conditions. While the framework will not cover myasthentia gravis specifically, it will recommend improvements in standards, care and support that will benefit everyone with a neurological condition. We are committed to publishing the framework as soon as possible.

We have no specific plans to raise awareness of the condition among the medical profession. The Department is not responsible for setting curricula for health professional training; that is the responsibility of the statutory and professional bodies. However we do share a commitment with those bodies that all health professionals are trained so that they have the skills and knowledge to deliver a high quality health service to all groups of the population with whom they deal.

Mr. Best: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans the Government have to increase awareness about myasthenia gravis amongst members of the medical professions. [189133]

Dr. Ladyman: We have no specific plans to raise awareness of the condition among the medical profession. The Department is not responsible for setting curricula for health professional training; that is the responsibility of the statutory and professional bodies. However we do share a commitment with those bodies that all health professionals are trained so that they have the skills and knowledge to deliver a high quality health service to all groups of the population with whom they deal.

The national service framework for long-term conditions will focus on improving services for people with neurological conditions. While the framework will not cover myasthenia gravis specifically, it will recommend improvements in standards, care and support that will benefit everyone with a neurological condition.

We are committed to publishing the framework as soon as possible.

NHS Direct

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many and what percentage of calls to each NHS Direct call centre in England in the last 12 months related to dental problems. [188566]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Information on the total number and percentage of calls to each call centre in England relating to dental problems is not collected centrally.

NHS Psychiatry

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) psychiatrists and (b) community psychiatric nurses were (i) recruited to and (ii) left the NHS in each of the last three years. [189418]

Mr. Hutton: Work force data are collected through the annual non-medical work force census. The census is a snapshot of data on a specific day in the appropriate year. The information shown in the table shows the net difference each year in the number of consultants within the psychiatry group and the number of qualified nurses working in community psychiatry between September 2000 and September 2003. Data on numbers of leavers and joiners in the national health service is not available.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the vacancy rates are for (a) psychiatrists and (b) community psychiatric nurses in the NHS. [189425]

Mr. Hutton: As at March 2004 the three month vacancy rate was 9.6 per cent. for psychiatrists and 1.9 per cent. for qualified nurses working in community psychiatric nursing services.

NHS Staff (York)

Hugh Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many full-time equivalent NHS (a) general practitioners, (b) nurses in general practitioner practices, (c) other NHS community nurses and (d) community-based NHS staff in each of the other professions allied to medicine there were in the greater York area in (i) 1994 and (ii) each year since then. [189761]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested is shown in the table.

NHS Treatment Centres

Dr. Richard Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will ensure that any spare capacity in NHS treatment centres is used before involving independent sector treatment centres at a higher cost to the NHS. [189456]

Mr. Hutton: Both national health service treatment centres and independent sector treatment centres are intended to build capacity to treat NHS patients as safely, quickly and cost effectively as possible. Currently, it is a matter for primary care trusts (PCTs) to commission providers to meet the needs of their local populations. There is no extra cost to a PCT of using independent sector providers. In future, the decision whether or not patients are referred to a NHS provider or an independent sector provider will be down to the choice of individual patients.

Occupational Asthma

Stephen Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his Department's policy is on encouraging businesses to invest in occupational health services for employees who develop occupational asthma; and if he will make a statement. [189869]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Department's policy is to encourage responsible employers and businesses, large, medium and small, to invest in occupational health services for all their employees. To that end, NHS Plus was launched by the Department in November 2001. NHS Plus is now a network of over 100 occupational health departments that sell occupational health (OH) services to the private sector. These services include access to treatment for occupational asthma.

In the NHS Improvement Plan we said that building on the work of NHS Plus, the national health service can play an increasingly vital role in ensuring that employees are able to return to work as soon as possible following illness or injury. The Department will work with the Health and Safety Executive and the Department for Work and Pensions to ensure that a wider occupational health approach is supported by the NHS.

Out-of-hours GP Cover

Mr. Simon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the (a) NHS litigation authority and (b) the primary care trust which has made arrangements for out-of-hours general practitioner cover will be liable in cases of clinical negligence where the negligent treatment was provided by an out-of-hours service commissioned by a primary care trust. [187371]

Mr. Hutton: If an out-of-hours service is commissioned by a primary care trust (PCT), the provider of the service will be expected to obtain their own insurance cover. The national health service litigation authority is not liable for claims as it administers the clinical negligence scheme for trusts on behalf of trusts, who retain the legal liability for clinical negligence claims.

If the PCT provides out-of-hours services itself, then any negligent act would be covered by the PCT.

Patient and Public Involvement Forums

Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average time between application, interview and recruitment of members to Patient and Public Involvement Forums has been in (a) Greater London and (b) England. [189704]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The average time between application and formal acceptance for members of patients' forums is 29 days for both England and London[1]. In cases where there is greater urgency, for example when a forum has fewer than seven members, the recruitment process can be accelerated to achieve completion in seven days.

[1] Source:

Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health who will be responsible for recruiting members to Patient and Public Involvement Forums when the Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health is abolished. [189705]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The intention is that the National Health Service Appointments Commission will become responsible for recruiting and appointing members to patients' forums.

Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patient and public involvement forums have had fewer than seven members for (a) three months, (b) six months and (c) 12 months in (i) Greater London and (ii) England. [189720]

Ms Rosie Winterton: At the end of March 2004, England had 13 patients' forums, out of a total of 572, with fewer than seven members, and London had none, out of a total of 74. At the end of June 2004, those figures were 52 and eight respectively[1]. Patients' forums did not exist a year ago.

[1] Source:

Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of members of patient and public involvement forums are from ethnic minority communities in (a) Greater London and (b) England. [189735]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Equal opportunities information completed by patients' forum members on recruitment show that 10 per cent, are from minority ethnic communities. The figures are not yet available for London, but the Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health is carrying out diversity surveys in each of its nine regions, which will provide information on minority ethnic and other diverse communities.

Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patient and public involvement forums have the minimum number of seven members in (a) Greater London and (b) England. [189736]

Ms Rosie Winterton: At 4 October 2004, England had 486 patients' forums with at least seven members and London had 58.

Reproductive Health

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) whether the national health service will fund intracytoplasmic sperm injection (ICSI) treatment as part of the availability of IVF; [188931]

(2) what guidance he has given to primary care trusts on access to IVF treatment; [188935]

(3) when universal availability of IVF treatment will be introduced; whether a limit will be placed on the number of cycles of treatment available; and if he will make a statement. [188936]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) on 4 October 2004, Official Report, columns 1977–79W. The clinical guideline issued to the national health service by the National Institute for Clinical Excellence in February 2004 gives guidance on the use of intracytoplasmic sperm injection (ICSI) in the treatment of infertility. It makes clear that ICSI should be considered as the appropriate treatment where certain clinical conditions occur.

Ritalin

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his Department's latest estimate is of the number of children under 11 receiving the medication Ritalin; and if he will make a statement. [189982]

Dr. Ladyman: Information is not available in the form requested. Data are not held on the number of people who receive a particular medication. However, the figures in the following table show the total number of prescription items of Methylphenidate Hydrochloride dispensed in the community in England in the last six years. In 2003, Ritalin accounted for 40 per cent. of the prescription items of Methylphenidate Hydrochloride. Other brands of Methylphenidate, Concerta and Equasym, accounted for 43 per cent. and 17 per cent. respectively of the total prescriptions issued.

In 2003, it is estimated that around 90 per cent. of the 314,500 prescription items dispensed in the community were to children (children under 16 and young people aged 16 to 18 in full time education). This proportion has been similar over recent years.

Road Traffic Accidents

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many serious brain injuries caused by road traffic accidents were recorded in (a) 1975, (b) 1980, (c) 1990, (d) 2000 and (e) 2003. [189931]

Dr. Ladyman: Data are only available from 1990–91 onwards due to changes in the way data were collected. Before then data for the hospitals in-patients inquiry were collected on death and discharges on a 10 per cent. sample basis. For the hospital episode statistics system we use now, data are based on a 100 per cent. sample of finished consultant episodes.

Sexual Health Services

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average waiting times for sexual health services in the NHS are. [189421]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The average genito-urinary medicine access time is not available. However the Department is currently working with the Health Protection Agency and the Healthcare Commission to develop primary care trust level waiting time information. The Healthcare Commission is considering how best this developing information source can be used in its assessments of the performance of healthcare organisations.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department is taking to deal with sexually transmitted diseases, with particular reference to young people; and if he will make a statement. [189779]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Government's steps for dealing with sexually transmitted diseases are set out in the national strategy for sexual health and HIV, the teenage pregnancy strategy, the national strategy for sexual health and HIV implementation action plan and the Government response to the Health Select Committee's third report of session 2002–03 on sexual health. Copies of these documents are available in the Library.

Both the sexual health and teenage pregnancy strategies recognise young people as being disproportionately affected by poor sexual and reproductive health and implementation of the strategies includes specific action to address this. The National service framework for children, young people and maternity services, published on 15 September, also includes sexual and reproductive health and provides specific standards and markers of good practice to drive up the quality of services at local level.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many sexually transmitted diseases were recorded in the Redbridge, Havering and Barking NHS Trust area in (a) 1999, (b) 2000, (c) 2001 and (d) 2002. [189780]

Smoke-free Workplaces

Mr. Frank Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what research he has commissioned to evaluate the economic effects on businesses of making workplaces smoke-free; [189823]

(2) what evidence is held by the Government on the economic effects on the hospitality trade of making their premises smoke-free; [189824]

(3) what advice he has received on the effects of smoke-free workplaces on (a) productivity, (b) absenteeism and (c) fire damage. [189825]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The annual report of the Chief Medical Officer on the state of the public health presented an economic assessment of the effects of banning smoking in the workplace and public places. A copy is available in the Library.

Speech Therapists

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many speech therapists entered training in each of the last five years. [189359]

Mr. Hutton: Information on the number of speech and language therapists entering training in each of the last five years is shown in the table.

Between September 1997 and 2003, the number of speech and language therapists employed in the NHS has increased by 1,372 or 28 per cent. We expect that there will be further increases in the NHS speech and language therapy workforce as a result of the Delivering the NHS Plan forecast for 30,000 more therapists and scientists in the NHS by 2008 over a 2001 baseline.

The number of training places for speech and language therapy is also increasing. In 2003–04, 630 students entered training to become a speech therapist, a 38 per cent. increase since 1998–99.

Terminally Ill Patients

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has commissioned regarding the provision of support for terminally ill patients who wish to die in their homes; what NHS resources are available to such patients; and what plans he has to increase the level of such support. [186671]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Department has not commissioned any research into the provision of support for terminally ill patients who wish to die in their homes. Cancer Networks have, however, been asked to conduct a population based palliative care needs assessment in response to the recommendations of the supportive and palliative care guidance produced by the National Institute for Clinical Excellence. This assessment will map currently available palliative care services and inform the range and volume of services required in each network.

The National Cancer Research Institute has recently announced that funds of up to £5 million will be released over the next five years to improve the way cancer care research is carried out in the United Kingdom. The Department will be committing £500,000 per annum to this initiative, and Macmillan Cancer Relief, Marie Curie Cancer Care, the Medical Research Council and Cancer Research UK will also be contributing. It is hoped that proposals to stimulate and develop new research on care from diagnosis to end-of-life will be submitted in response to this initiative, in addition to proposals on bereavement for carers.

I would also refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron) on 25 May 2004, Official Report, column 1606W.

Tuberculosis

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many vacancies there were and what the vacancy rates were for consultants specialising in TB in (a) England and (b) each strategic health authority in each year since 1996; [187883]

(2) how many consultants were specialising in TB in (a) England and (b) each strategic health authority, in (i) headcount and (ii) whole time equivalent terms in each year since 1996. [187884]

Mr. Hutton: Information about specialists working in tuberculosis since 1996 has been placed in the Library. Vacancy information for 2002 to 2004 has also been placed in the Library. Prior to 2002 vacancy information was aggregated and it is not possible to identify TB specialists separately.

Venous Thrombosis

Dr. Richard Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of NHS hospitals undertaking joint replacement surgery have a consultant haematologist or orthopaedic surgeon with special training or interest in venous thrombosis. [189454]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is not collected centrally.

All hospitals undertaking joint replacement or any other form of surgery are expected to have the appropriate clinical skill mix to ensure that procedures are performed safely and to a high standard.

The number of consultant haematologists and trauma and orthopaedic surgeons in England has increased by 144 (29.5 per cent.) and 462 (43.8 per cent.) respectively between September 1997 and June 2004. Individual doctors' special interests are not collected by the Department.

Trauma and orthopaedic surgery	1,056	1,518	43.8

Vulnerable Citizens (Doorstep Selling)

Mr. Truswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the potential role of health and social care workers in promoting awareness among vulnerable citizens of the threats associated with doorstep cold calling. [189731]

Dr. Ladyman: The Department is represented on the cross-departmental Ministerial group, which has been established to encourage a more joined approach amongst agencies in addressing the problems of crime associated with doorstep selling. The group will consider what actions to take to improve consumer protection against doorstep selling.

Waiting Times

Ian Lucas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance he has issued to NHS trusts in England concerning targets for waiting times for patients from Wales. [182445]

Mr. Hutton: English national health service trusts treat many Welsh patients living close to the border between Wales and England. As health and the NHS are a devolved matter, it is for the National Assembly for Wales to agree waiting time targets for Welsh residents, irrespective of where they are treated. The Department's current advice to NHS trusts in England is that, as a matter of good practice, they should treat patients registered with general practitioners in Wales within the waiting time standards that apply for England.

Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the waiting times were for (a) heart surgery, (b) orthopaedics, (c) ophthalmology and (d) cancer treatment in the West Suffolk Hospitals NHS Trust in each year since 1997. [187196]

Dr. Ladyman: The elective waiting times for heart surgery, orthopaedics, ophthalmology and cancer treatment at West Suffolk Hospitals National Health Service trust are shown in the table.

Median and mean waiting times (days) for West Suffolk Hospital NHS Trust (RGR) for elective admissions (waiting time and booked) with main operation heart surgery, orthopaedics and ophthalmology, and for primary care diagnosis cancer treatment in each year since 1997–98 to 2002–03

Notes:

Diagnosis (Primary Diagnosis)

The primary diagnosis is the first of up to 14 (seven prior to 2002-03) diagnosis fields in the HES data set and provides the main reason why the patient was in hospital.

Main operation

The main operation is the first recorded operation in the HES data set and is usually the most resource-intensive procedure performed during the episode. It is appropriate to use main operation when looking at admission details, for example, time waited, but the figures for "all operations count of episodes" give a more complete count of episodes with an operation.

Grossing

Figures are grossed for both coverage and missing/invalid clinical data, except for 2002-03, which are not yet adjusted for shortfalls.

Time Waited

Time waited statistics from HES are not the same as the published waiting list statistics. HES provides counts and time waited for all patients admitted to hospital within a given period whereas the published waiting list statistics count those waiting for treatment on a specific date and how long they have been on the waiting list. Also, HES calculates the time waited as the difference between the admission and decision to admit dates. Unlike published waiting list statistics, this is not adjusted for self-deferrals or periods of medical/social suspension.

Wheelchair Services

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to make a statement on the future of wheelchair services and equipment loan stores. [R] [190037]

Dr. Ladyman: A statement is planned for the autumn on modernising wheelchair services. This will help local primary care trust commissioners shape the future of wheelchair services. The integration of health and social services' equipment loan stores, generally known since 2001 as community equipment services, is underway.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Fines

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people were fined following criminal convictions in each of the last 15 years; [190047]

(2) what percentage of fines imposed after a criminal conviction were fully paid in each of the last two financial years; [190048]

(3) what the total amount was of fines imposed after criminal conviction outstanding in each of the last five financial years in England and Wales; [190049]

(4) how many people in England and Wales who were fined following a criminal conviction have fines arrears (a) in excess of £1,000, (b) in excess of £2,000, (c) in excess of £3,000, (d) in excess of £4,000, (e) in excess of £5,000 and (f) in excess of £10,000. [190050]

Paul Goggins: The number of persons fined in England and Wales for offences of all types is as follows:

	Number of persons fined
1988	1,228,029
1989	1,205,958
1990	1,172,725
1991	1,147,845
1992	1,166,347
1993	1,078,246
1994	1,043,639
1995	986,033
1996	1,061,493
1997	987,985
1998	1,049,115
1999	982,679
2000	1,003,555
2001	920,474
2002	963,977

Principal offence basis

Fines are collected by the magistrates courts. Information obtained from the Department for Constitutional Affairs states that the information on the percentage of fines which are fully paid and the total amount of fines outstanding in a financial year is not collected by the legacy systems used by the Magistrates Courts Committees. Similarly, information is not collected in terms of the numbers of people who have fines arrears in excess of a specific sum.

Animal Experimentation

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the increase in the number of procedures involving animals compiled under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986. [188098]

Caroline Flint: The latest available data on the number of licensed scientific procedures involving animals are in the publication Statistics of Scientific Procedures on Living Animals in Great Britain (Command 6,291—copies are in the Library).

This shows that 2.79 million procedures, regulated under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, were started in 2003. This is an increase of 2.2 per cent. from the previous year, but this is within the limits of what are regarded as minor variations between years. It does not necessarily signal an established upward trend in animal use.

The pattern of species use is similar to that recorded in previous years. Rats, mice and other rodents were used in 85 per cent. of the procedures. A further 10 per cent. involved use of fish and birds.

The species afforded special protection under the 1986 Act—cats, dogs, primates and equidae—were used in less than 1 per cent. of the total. Though within this relatively small percentage there was an increase in procedures using primates, the number of such animals used for the first time fell slightly. This is because some animals can be reused in certain mild procedures, such as blood sampling.

The trend over recent years, whereby the overall balance of use has gradually tipped more towards genetically modified animals, has continued. Such animals—mainly mice—were used in 2003 in 27 per cent. of all procedures, which is only 1 per cent. up on 2002, but compares with 8 per cent. in 1995. Most regulated procedures concerning these animals relate to breeding and the maintenance of colonies.

The total number of procedures in 2003 is considerably less than those recorded annually in the 1970s and 1980s, though the general downward trend since then has levelled out over the last decade.

It is impossible to predict the number of procedures likely to be undertaken in future years, as many factors are involved over which the Government have no direct control. These include strategic decisions by funding bodies, global economic trends and developments as a result of scientific innovation and endeavour.

But further increases as part of a longer term upward trend are likely, as use of genetically altered animals opens up new avenues of medical research, as more drugs and medicines are developed, and as new regulatory safety and testing requirements come into effect.

The numbers used will, however, be minimised in each programme of work, through rigorous application by the Home Office of the licensing controls in the 1986 Act.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to achieve his policy to reduce the number of animals involved in experimentations. [188099]

Caroline Flint: The Government's responsibilities are to seek to reduce the animals used by minimising the number in particular projects, rather than through a reduction in the overall total, which in a demand-led area such as scientific research would not be practicable.

The use of animals can be licensed only under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 where there is no non-animal alternative, and then only when both the number of animals to be used and any resulting suffering is minimised. This reflects application of the 3Rs (replacement, reduction and refinement). Every step is taken in assessing licence applications, both at the establishments concerned and within the Home Office, to ensure that no 3R alternative is overlooked, and that licence authorities maintain that position.

The Home Office has previously funded work to the value of approximately £250,000 a year for projects to promote and deliver reduction and refinements. We also co-sponsored the 4th World Congress on Alternatives and Animal Use in the Life Sciences, and are a co-sponsor of the 5th World Congress due to take place later this year.

Earlier this year we announced the setting up of the National Centre for the 3Rs, which will act as a focal point for research in this important area. This implements a recommendation of the House of Lords Select Committee on Animals in Scientific Procedures. Responsibility for the National Centre rests with the Office of Science and Technology.

The Home Office continues to lead in running the Inter-Departmental Group on the 3Rs, a cross-Government body which considers many alternatives issues and keeps under review the Inter-Departmental Data Sharing Concordat.

We also support related efforts at the international level, including contributions to the European Centre for the Validation of Alternative Methods (ECVAM), on which there is a Home Office representative.

The main gains in the 3Rs have come from the scientific community itself, and any future progress is likely to come in the main from its own continuing efforts to develop, validate and adopt alternatives.

Antisocial Behaviour Orders

Siobhain McDonagh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) acceptable behaviour contracts, (b) interim anti-social behaviour orders and (c) full anti-social behaviour orders have been issued in Mitcham and Morden. [189354]

Ms Blears: Data are not collected centrally on numbers of acceptable behaviour contracts agreed.

No notification of interim anti-social behaviour orders (ASBOs) issued within the London borough of Merton (in which Mitcham and Morden are located) have been reported to the Home Office.

The number of notifications received, up to 31 March 2004 (latest available), of full ASBOs issued, where restrictions imposed are specific to the London borough of Merton, is six.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many anti-social behaviour orders have been served in the Leeds city council area since they were introduced. [189942]

Ms Blears: The number of notifications received by the Home Office, up to 31 March 2004 (latest available), of Anti-Social Behaviour Orders issued, where restrictions imposed are specific to the Leeds city council area, is 122.

Breathalyser Tests

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many breathalyser tests were carried out in the Buckingham constituency in each year since 2000; and what percentage resulted in convictions. [189858]

Ms Blears: Available information collected centrally on breath tests is at police force area level only. Buckingham constituency falls within the Thames Valley police force area. The table shows the number of breathalyser tests undertaken in Thames Valley in each year between 2000 and 2002 and the percentage resulting in a positive test or a refusal.

Thames Valley

Positive/refused	Number of screening breath tests	Percentage
2000	30,800	17
2001	26,200	18
2002	25,300	30

Central Casualty Bureau

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Central Casualty Bureau is funded by central Government. [184597]

Ms Blears: There is no specific ring-fenced budget to meet the costs of running the Central Casualty Bureau when it has been opened. Funding is derived from the central Government police grant, as are all other police activity costs.

If the Central Casualty Bureau has been opened on behalf of a number of counties, forces may make a retrospective contribution following the incident.

Chechnya

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will halt the deportation to the Russian Federation of citizens from the Chechnya region until such time as their safety can be guaranteed; and if he will make a statement. [187979]

Mr. Browne: At the present time country information does not indicate that there are any reasons to halt the return to the Russian Federation of individuals from Chechnya, including those whose claims for asylum have been rejected, who no longer have a right to stay in the United Kingdom.

All asylum and human rights claims are considered on their individual merits in accordance with our obligations under the 1951 UN Refugee Convention and the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). This consideration takes into account up to date information on the situation in the country of origin.

Child Abductions

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made by the Police Information Technology Organisation on developing new systems for alerting the public about child abductions. [189428]

Caroline Flint: The Police Information Technology Organisation (PITO) has tested the alert messaging capabilities of the Police Portal. The Portal can provide any force with a means to alert public subscribers, for example by text message to mobile phones, to inform them of child abductions. Planned co-operation with local media to quickly broadcast child alerts has proved itself the most reliable means for informing and engaging public support.

The Association of Chief Police Officers has decided to progress the Portal's alert capability in the first instance for emergency messaging to those in the public and private sectors who have responsibility for public safety. This is being taken forward by a PITO Service

Implementation Group, with representatives from the Metropolitan police, London Resilience within the Government Office for London, the Home Office and Cabinet Office.

Community Sentences

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment has been made of the impact of community sentencing on re-offending rates. [182288]

Paul Goggins: There was a 3.1 per cent. reduction in reconviction rates for those commencing community penalties in 1999, compared to 1997. The methodology is explained in Home Office On-line Report 16/02.

Community Support Officers

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how long it takes to train a community support officer. [186907]

Ms Blears: The length of training given to Community Support Officers is a matter for individual chief officers to determine. In most forces training lasts from three to six weeks and combines classroom training with supervised patrol.

Corrections Bill

Mr. Hopkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to bring forward a Corrections Bill; and if he will make a statement. [189088]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 16 September 2004]: We intend to introduce legislation at the next available opportunity to implement a number of reforms which follow Lord Carter's review of the Correctional Services.

Correspondence

Sir Gerald Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he intends to reply to the letter to him dated 8 June from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regards to Mr. and Mrs. T. Mahmoud; [188872]

(2) when he will reply to the letter to him dated 8 June from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Mr. T. Mahmoud. [189706]

Mr. Blunkett: Home Office officials have sent to my right hon. Friend a copy of the reply I sent to him on 12 July. I am sorry it did not reach him. Mr. and Mrs. Mahmoud do appear to qualify for consideration under the one-off exercise announced in October 2003, which allows a number of people who have claimed asylum and who have children in the UK to remain here indefinitely. Their case is now being considered.

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Torbay of 26 August regarding NHS work permits. [189649]

Mr. Browne: The Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) replied to the hon. Member on 21 September.

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the reasons for the delay in responding to the hon. Member for Leicester East's letter of 17 May. [189933]

Mr. Browne: The Managed Migration Directorate (MM) of the Immigration and Nationality Directorate replied to my hon. Friend on 8 September 2004.

MM apologised for the delay in replying, which was due to an administrative error. MM now have systems in place to minimise such delays in replying to official correspondence.

Departmental Expenditure

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much was spent by his Department on (a) advertising and (b) public relations consultants in each of the past eight years. [184805]

Mr. Blunkett: The Home Office uses advertising and public relations consultants in support of public information and communication campaigns. Since 1996–97 spending has been as follows:

1996–97

£5.23 million on advertising costs as part of total spend of £8.328 million. Communication spend represents 0.13 per cent. of total Home Office public expenditure of £6,416 million.

Campaigns included car crime, recruitment of special constables, fire safety and electoral registration.

1997–98

£1.4million on advertising costs as part of total spend of £3.372 million on total communications. Communication spend represented 0.05 per cent. of total Home Office public expenditure of £6,747 million.

Campaigns included recruitment of special constables, fire safety, absent voting and electoral registration.

1998–99

£1.8 million on advertising costs as part of total spend of £4.194 million on total communications. Communication spend represents 0.06 per cent. of total Home Office public expenditure of £7,608.2 million.

Campaigns included smoke alarms, recruitment of special constables, crime partnerships and electoral registration.

1999–2000

£5.65 million on advertising costs as part of total spend of £10.08 million on total communications. Communication spend represents 0.13 per cent. of total Home Office public expenditure of £7,996.2 million.

Campaigns included chip pan safety, fire safety, recruitment of special constables, European Parliament elections and electoral registration.

2000–01

£28.36 million on advertising costs as part of total spend of £35.637 million on total communication. Communication spend represents 0.39 per cent. of total Home office public expenditure of £9,068.7million.

Campaigns included fire safety, vehicle crime and recruitment of police officers.

2001–02

£14.4 million on advertising costs as part of total spend of £25.1 million on total communications. Communication spend represented 0.23 per cent. of total Home Office expenditure of £10,820.8 million.

Campaigns included fire safety (smoke alarms), vehicle crime, internet child protection, drugs, recruitment of police officers and special constables and postal voting.

2002–03

£9.9 million on advertising costs as part of total spend of £18.3 million on total communications. 0.14 per cent. of total Home Office public expenditure of £13,493.1 million.

Campaigns included vehicle crime, internet child protection, drugs, firearms amnesty and recruitment of police officers.

2003–04

£12.487 million on advertising costs as part of total spend of £22.083 million on total communications. Communication spend represents 0.18 per cent. of total Home Office expenditure of £12,605.5million.

Campaigns included vehicle crime, internet child protection, drugs, recruitment of police officers and domestic.

Figures up to 1997–98 are on a cash basis; after that they reflect the introduction of full Resource Accounting and Budgeting.

Dr. Bassam Odeh

Clare Short: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when a decision will be made on the status of Dr. Bassam Odeh (Home Office reference A574053) following his successful appeal on 29 January. [189142]

Mr. Browne: A decision has been made to grant Dr. Odeh refugee status in the United Kingdom. The Immigration and Nationality Directorate is currently in the process of issuing the necessary status papers.

Drug Treatment

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement on the tender document for drug rehabilitation services in the Prison Service reference ST04589/659/1; and for what reason it was changed; [188607]

(2) what consultation he has undertaken with those who have provided drugs services in prisons on the new tender process. [188608]

Paul Goggins: The tender documents set out the basis for delivery of drug treatment in prisons. Changes have been made to reflect developments in drug treatment policy and to bring greater clarity around service delivery standards, pricing and performance.

There has been extensive consultation on the new tender process with those who currently provide drug treatment services in prisons. This has included two national conferences for providers and a number of one-to-one discussions.

English Language Tests

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will report progress in (a) developing criteria for English language tests for new entrants, (b) delivering English language tests and (c) exemption from tests of entrants from traditionally English-speaking countries. [188232]

Mr. Browne: From 28 July 2004, the standard of knowledge of English required of naturalisation applicants has been defined as English for Speakers of Other Languages (ESOL) Entry 3. Applicants can demonstrate this by submitting with their application an ESOL certificate, an alternative qualification for learners of English of an equivalent or higher level, or an educational qualification that could have been obtained only by someone with good English.

Naturalisation applicants from traditionally English-speaking countries are not exempted from this requirement. They should either produce an appropriate educational qualification—one which could have been obtained only by someone with good English—or seek certification from a "designated person" that they have a knowledge of English to the level reasonably to be expected of a person of full age and capacity whose native language is English. At present, only Notaries are designated but further groups are being considered.

European Borders Agency

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the decision of the United Kingdom to accept limited participation in the European Borders Agency, without Gibraltar; and for what reason the United Kingdom's full participation was rejected by the EU. [188482]

Mr. Browne [holding answer 14 September 2004]: Operational co-operation in the Agency is important to the UK, as an effectively managed external border is in the interests of all Member States. We therefore took an active role in negotiations to ensure that provision was made for involving the UK in the Agency's activities.

The UK is not participating in the adoption of the Border Agency Regulation because the Council took the view that the UK could not opt in under the Title IV Protocol, because the regulation builds on the external border provisions of the Schengen acquis, in which the UK does not participate. Accordingly the UK has no vote on adoption. The UK disagrees with this interpretation and with the express exclusion of Gibraltar.

The UK does not participate in the external border provisions of the Schengen acquis, because we believe it necessary to retain the right to carry out our own frontier controls.

Excessive Drinking

Mr. Best: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent assessment he has made of the impact of initiatives by the licensed trade to curb excessive drinking. [189129]

Ms Blears: The Interim Analytical Report, which led to the publication of the Alcohol Harm Reduction Strategy for England in March this year highlighted some good initiatives undertaken by the alcohol industry collectively and individually but found that good practice was sporadic and unco-ordinated. One of the recommendations in the Strategy was for Government to develop a social responsibility scheme together with the industry. We are working closely with industry representatives to take this recommendation forward.

The Alcohol Misuse Enforcement Campaign that has been running this summer saw concerted activity by police and partners to tackle alcohol related violence and disorder and target under age and binge drinking. The results of the campaign highlight the need for more to be done on the part of the industry.

Mr. Best: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the costs involved in policing alcohol-related anti-social behaviour in (a) England and Wales, (b) West Yorkshire and (c) Leeds in the last year for which figures are available. [189130]

Ms Blears: Police authority accounts are not kept in a form which would make it possible to identify the costs of policing alcohol related anti-social behaviour, and there is no specific grant made available to forces to deal directly with the problems associated with excessive drinking. It is for individual police forces to decide how they allocate their resources to tackle their crime and disorder priorities.

The Alcohol Harm Reduction Strategy for England, published on March 15 this year estimates that alcohol-related crime and disorder costs taxpayers up to £7.3 billion a year.

False Passports

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many bogus passports were recovered in police operations in the last year for which figures are available. [187061]

Mr. Browne: The information requested is not available as the number of bogus passports recovered is not collated centrally.

Identity Cards

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library the performance milestones in the contract for the design and structure of an identity card. [188704]

Mr. Browne: No contracts have been let for the design and structure of the identity card.

Immigration and Asylum Events

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many events the Home Office has organised for public organisations on immigration and asylum since 2003. [189978]

Mr. Browne: The Home Office organises a range of events concerning asylum and immigration, which involve other organisations from outside Government and within. However, details of these are not held centrally and can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Managed Migration Department

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people work at the Managed Migration Department. [189932]

Mr. Browne: As of 30 June 2004, there were 2,286 permanent staff employed in the Managed Migration Directorate (2,096.9 full-time equivalent).

National Offender Management Scheme

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has held with (a) county probation officers and (b) criminal justice boards on the National Offender Management Scheme. [168308]

Paul Goggins: All probation staff have been given the opportunity to comment on both written consultation documents issued since January 2004. Additionally the chief executive of the National Offender Management Service has conducted 10 regional meetings involving over 3,000 staff from the probation and prison service.

Local criminal justice boards have also been offered opportunities to comment on the written consultation documents and their responses made up just under 10 per cent. of those received to the second exercise.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how long stakeholders have been given to respond to the paper on the structure of the National Offender Management Service. [176675]

Paul Goggins: There have been two formal written consultation documents issued since January 2004. "Reducing Crime—Changing Lives" was published in January 2004 with a deadline for response of 4 March. The consultation paper on the organisational design was issued in May with a deadline of 30 June for response. In both instances submissions were received and accepted beyond these dates and included in the analysis of responses. In accordance with the Cabinet Office Code of Practice on Consultation a summary analysis and response is being prepared and will be issued by the Government shortly.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultations he has had with the major providers of drugs services to jails in England and Wales concerning the introduction of the National Offender Management Service. [181827]

Paul Goggins: There have been two formal written consultations on the introduction of the National Offender Management Service (NOMS) and a number of the major providers of drug services have taken the opportunity to contribute. These responses have been analysed and used as the basis for informing policy developments. The providers of drugs services are important partners within NOMS and the National Offender Manager met representatives of drug service agencies in September. A new unit reporting to the National Offender Manager has been established to oversee relationships with the voluntary sector.

Mr. Hopkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what way the creation of regional offender managers within the National Offender Management Service will contribute towards reducing the prison population. [189090]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 16 September 2004]: The Regional Offender Managers will play a pivotal role in reforming the delivery of correctional services, the principal aim of which is to reduce re-offending. Key features of these reforms are the development of end-to-end management of offenders and a greater use of effective community sentences in place of short-term imprisonment.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how regional offender managers in the National Offender Management Service structure will hold probation areas to account for their performance. [190115]

Paul Goggins: The Regional Offender Managers (ROMS) will hold probation areas to account through service level agreements, which will be based on existing standards and key performance targets.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what budgets regional offender managers will have for (a) 2004–05 and (b) 2005–06. [190116]

Paul Goggins: The budgets for Regional Offender Manager in full for 2005–06 will be determined in light of the development of the National Offender Management Service (NOMS) and the overall budget for NOMS in 2005–06.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the timetable is for the introduction of market testing of prison establishments under the National Offender Management Service. [168425]

Paul Goggins: An announcement about the Market Testing of prison establishments will be made in due course.

Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether each Governor will be responsible for setting charges for prisoner places for their own establishment under the new structure for the National Offender Management Service; [168833]

(2) who will be responsible for setting the cost to regional offender managers for places in (a) public and (b) privately run prisons under the new National Offender Management Service structure. [168834]

Paul Goggins: A pricing and charging mechanism for prisoner places is currently being considered as part of the National Offender Management Service (NOMS) Change Programme. Any mechanism will be agreed by the Chief Executive of NOMS and approved by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he plans to (a) privatise and (b) open to contestability a (i) probation area and (ii) National Offender Management Service region. [188538]

Paul Goggins: There are no plans to privatise any part of the National Offender Management Service, or its regions or probation areas.

We are considering how we might open up probation services to contestability but no decisions have yet been made on the scope or extent of this.

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how he expects contestability in the National Offender Management Service to achieve more effective service delivery. [188539]

Paul Goggins: In the report "Managing Offenders-Reducing Crime" Lord Carter emphasised that service delivery can be further improved through greater use of competition from private and voluntary sectors. We accept this advice and said so in our response "Reducing Crime—Changing Lives".

We want the most cost effective custodial and community sentences no matter who delivers them. Contestability ensures value for money, with the optimum combination of cost, quality and effectiveness delivered through competition and partnership arrangements between and within the public, private and voluntary sectors.

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how probation boards under the National Offender Management Service structure will extend their commissioning functions. [188540]

Paul Goggins: Under existing legislation, Probation Boards have the power to commission all the services of their probation area.

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how regional offender managers with the National Offender Management Service will achieve greater innovation within the prison and probation services. [188541]

Paul Goggins: Regional Offender Managers will play a key role in reforming the delivery of correctional services and implementing the new sentencing framework.

The Regional Offender Managers will steer the development of the core offender management function and contestability. These changes require effective working between the prison and probation services, and wider co-ordination above Probation Board level in order to ensure nation-wide consistency and accountability in our approach to reducing re-offending.

Mrs. Ann Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department who will have the authority to move a prisoner to another prison once a place has been purchased by a regional offender manager under the new structure for the National Offender Management Service. [168784]

Paul Goggins: Prisoners move between establishments for a variety of different reasons. Decisions to transfer prisoners will be a matter for the Regional Offender Manager, advised by the Offender Manager, Population Management Unit and others.

Mrs. Ann Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it will be the responsibility of the Chief Executive of the National Offender Management Service to set the cost that can be charged for a prison place at each establishment. [168786]

Paul Goggins: A pricing and charging mechanism for prisoner places is currently being considered as part of the National Offender Management Service (NOMS)

Change Programme. Any mechanism will be agreed by the Chief Executive of NOMS and approved by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Nuclear Installations (Threat Assessments)

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many threat assessments to nuclear installations and nuclear materials in transit have been conducted by the Joint Terrorism Analysis Centre since 11 September 2001. [187308]

Mr. Blunkett: The Joint Terrorism Analysis Centre (JTAC) analytical effort devoted specifically to threats to nuclear installations and nuclear materials in transit is proportionate—and varies over time in response—to the number and credibility of those threats.

Paula Higson

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the appointment date was of Paula Higson; and what her current civil service grade is. [189934]

Mr. Browne: Paula Higson took up her appointment as Senior Director for Managed Migration on 15 September 2003. Ms Higson is a member of the Senior Civil Service.

Police

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what circumstances police community safety officers are (a) issued with batons and (b) allowed to use them. [189828]

Ms Blears: The equipment issued to Community Support Officers (CSOs) is at the discretion of individual chief officers, taking into account all the relevant health and safety considerations. I am not aware of any chief having authorised the issue of batons to CSOs.

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police Community Safety Officers were issued with batons in Parliament Square on the afternoon of 15 September. [189829]

Ms Blears: The Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis has confirmed that his Community Support Officers are not issued with batons and none was issued with batons on 15 September.

Hugh Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) police officers and (b) community support officers were employed in North Yorkshire in (i) May 1979 and (ii) each May since then. [188949]

Ms Blears: Information for police personnel strength in North Yorkshire is set out in the table. Since 1995 the frequency of the collection of police personnel data was reduced and is currently collected quarterly. To provide continuity the information in the table is for 31 March of each year from 1979.

[1] Police staff strength not available before 1986.

[2] Data prior to 1996 were collected by the Police Resources Unit of the Crime Reduction and Community Safety Group of the Home Office. 1996 to March 2004 is collected by the Home Office Research, Development and Statistics Directorate (RDS). August 2004 was collected separately outside of the normal data collection arrangements and has not been subject to the same validation as RDS data.

[3] The first CSOs were appointed in May 2003 to the North Yorkshire Constabulary.

Mr. Cameron: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) violent and (b) drug-related offences there were in the Thames Valley in (i) 1997, (ii) 2001 and (iii) the latest year for which figures are available. [186004]

Ms Blears [holding answer 22 July 2004]: Police recorded violent crime comprises violence against the person, sexual offences and robbery. The available statistics for violent crime in Thames Valley are given in the table.

Violent crime offences recorded by the police in Thames Valley

Period	Number of offences
1997	8,589
2001–02	29,201
2003–04	32,492

Note:

Numbers of recorded crimes are affected by changes in reporting and recording practice. In particular, changes to the counting rules in 1998 and the introduction of the National Crime Recording Standard in April 2002 led to an increase in the number of crimes recorded by the police.

In 2001–02, 25 per cent. of all violent crime recorded in Thames Valley were common assaults resulting in no injury to the victim. The equivalent figure for 2003–04 was 24 per cent.

It is not possible to identify drug-related crime from the recorded crime statistics. The figure for 1997 relates to offences of trafficking only in 1997. Possession and other drug offences were added to recorded crime series in 1998–99. The available information is given in the table.

Drug offences recorded by the police in Thames Valley

Period	Number of offences
1997[1]	566
2001–02[2]	4,903
2003–04[2]	5,404

[1] Drug trafficking only

[2] Drug trafficking, possession and other drug offences.

Note:

Numbers of recorded crimes are affected by changes in reporting and recording practice. In particular, changes to the counting rules in 1998 and the introduction of the National Crime Recording Standard in April 2002 led to an increase in the number of crimes recorded by the police.

The British Crime Survey (BCS) also provides data on the level of violent crime in England and Wales. However, due to the variability of specific offence figures at police force area level regional figures only are available. Data at regional level have been published as a rate per 10,000 adults since the 2001–02 BCS and are presented for the relevant region below.

Total BSC violence rate per 10,000 adults for the South East Region

2002–03	826
2003–04	704

Source:

2001–02, 2002–03, 2003–04 BCS Interviews

The difference in the above rates between 2001–02 and 2003–04 is not statistically significant, therefore the level of violent crime in the region has remained stable according to the BCS.

In the 2003–04 BCS, 55 per cent. of all violent crime in the South East resulted in no injury to the victim. Figures for previous years are not available.

The BCS does not have data published on the number of drug-related offences.

Prisons

David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library the findings of the IG16 report into a smoking policy for prisons from 1996. [185641]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 22 July 2004]: The review of prisoner smoking indicated in Instruction to Governors 16 of 1996 did not result in the production of a report.

However in 2003 the Department of Health and the Prison Service published "AQUITTED: Best practice guidance for developing smoking cessation services in prisons". Extra funding of £500,000 has been made available for each of the three years up to 2006. The launch of "AQUITTED" was supported by a programme of training seminars for staff of prisons and their local primary care trusts. The effectiveness of the initiative is being evaluated and a report is expected in 2005.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases involving equal pay claims against the Prison Service have been taken to an employment tribunal since 1997. [189863]

Paul Goggins: The number of claims for each year are:

	Number of claims
1997	0
1998	0
1999	998
2000	310
2001	5
2002	359
2003	12
2004	87

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many employment tribunals have found against the Prison Service in equal pay claims in each of the last five years; and what the financial implications of those decisions have been. [189865]

Paul Goggins: There have been findings against the Prison Service in eight equal pay claims since 1997. As these findings are currently subject to appeal by the Prison Service it is not possible to provide an estimate of the financial implications.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what appeals the Prison Service has made against decisions of employment tribunals in equal pay cases in 2004; and what the cost of those appeals has been. [189866]

Paul Goggins: The Prison Service lodged an appeal in the case of Bailey and Others v. Home Office on 26 August 2004. No date has been fixed for the hearing, and it is consequently not possible to estimate its cost.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what conclusions and recommendations have been made in the final report of the Prison Service's Safer Locals research project being conducted by Alison Liebling from Cambridge University; if he will make a statement; and if he will place a copy of the report in the Library. [190112]

Paul Goggins: Alison Liebling's final report of the Prison Service's Safer Locals research project is awaited.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in which prisons prisoners can undertake (a) vocational training courses and (b) construction industry training courses. [190119]

Paul Goggins: Improving the skills of offenders and our performance in placing them in sustainable employment is central to our strategy for reducing re-offending.

Although we do not collect this information centrally, by bringing together funding for education and vocational training into one ring fenced budget we have given the Prison Service more flexibility to decide locally how best to use their funds to support local work-based learning initiatives.

Recent capital investment to upgrade facilities in prison workshops, the introduction of prisoner training programmes with employer involvement, and greater joint working with sector skills councils—including with the Construction Industry Training Board—will further ensure that prisoners can achieve skills and qualifications in areas and at levels needed by industry.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners, on average, attended the prison chapel in each prison per week in the past 12 months. [190120]

Paul Goggins: This information is not routinely collated and could be done so only at disproportionate cost.

Prolific Priority Offender

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his definition is of a prolific priority offender. [190062]

Paul Goggins: The prolific and other priority offender (PPO) strategy has been designed to allow local areas to tackle those offenders who are causing the most harm to their communities and have been identified locally through police intelligence.

We have issued guidance on the criteria which should be used in selecting prolific and other priority offenders. This recommends that selection should be based upon the nature and volume of the crimes an individual is committing; the nature and volume of other harm they are causing (e.g. as a result of their gang leadership or antisocial behaviour); and other local criteria, based on the impact of the individuals concerned on their local communities.

Public Relations/Marketing

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much each police force spent on public relations and marketing consultants in the last year for which figures are available. [189306]

Ms Blears: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Racially Motivated Crime

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many racially motivated violent crimes have (a) been recorded and (b) resulted in successful prosecutions in each year since 1997, broken down by police force. [188065]

Ms Blears: Racially aggravated offences are now categorised with religiously aggravated offences. The two tables give available data for recorded offences, prosecutions and convictions.

Table 1—Number of racially aggravated recorded crimes in England and Wales, 1999–2000 to 2003–04

Financial year	Racially aggravated common assault	Racially aggravated other wounding	Racially aggravated harassment
1999–2000	4,275	2,687	10,758
2000–01	4,711	3,176	12,468
2001–02[1]	5,164	3,463	14,975
2002–03[1,2]	4,491	4,352	16,696
2003–04[1,2]	4,017	4,840	20,584

[1] The introduction of the National Crime Recording Standard on 1 April 2002 may have impacted on the figures. There may be some effect in 2001–02 from forces adopting the principles of the NCRS early.

[2] The figures include religiously aggravated offences from 2002–03.

Sentencing

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the recommendations were of the Sentencing Advisory Panel set out in spring 2003; and what his proposals are regarding implementation of each recommendation. [188707]

Paul Goggins: In February 2003, the Sentencing Advisory Panel issued advice to the Court of Appeal proposing a new sentencing guideline for the offence of causing death by dangerous driving. The advice is available on the Panel's website.

On 3 April 2003, the Court of Appeal issued sentencing guidelines based on the proposals from the Panel.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the sentencing guidelines will assist victims' representatives to understand the basis of sentences. [187241]

Paul Goggins: Yes. The Sentencing Guidelines Council will, in due course, provide guidelines that indicate a sentence of a particular kind, or within a particular range for each criminal offence. Under the Criminal Justice Act 2003, the court has a duty to state in open court, in ordinary language and in general terms, its reasons for deciding on the sentence passed. As part of this duty, where the court departs from guidelines relevant to the sentence it must state its reasons for doing so. The aim of these provisions is to enable the offender, victims and other interested parties better to understand why a particular sentence was imposed.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the reasons are for the changes in the (a) frequency and (b) number of sentences of imprisonment over the past 10 years. [187242]

Paul Goggins: The foremost reason for the increase in frequency and number of prison sentences is increased severity of sentencing. In 1993 the custody rate for persons sentenced at all courts in England and Wales was 4.2 per cent.; this had risen to 7.9 per cent. in 2002 (latest data available).

The new Sentencing Guidelines Council established by the Criminal Justice Act 2003 (CJA) will in due course create and revise a comprehensive set of Guidelines for all offences, so as to promote consistent and just sentencing by the courts within the framework provided by Parliament. In every individual case, judges and magistrates will continue to make their own decision as to the appropriate sentence, but will be required to operate within the council's guidelines or explain why they have gone outside them in that particular case.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Sentencing Guidelines Council will have a role in analyzing recent trends in magistrates' sentences. [187244]

Paul Goggins: The Sentencing Guidelines Council will be analysing sentencing data from all courts in taking forward its work.

Terrorism Offences

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people have been (a) arrested and (b) charged with an offence under the Anti-Terrorism Act 2000 in each year for which records are available; [187595]

(2) how many convictions have been secured for each category of offence under the Anti-Terrorism Act 2000 in each year for which records are available. [187596]

Mr. Blunkett: The figures requested are not routinely collected centrally by the police in the form requested. However, their records show that, cumulatively from 11 September 2001 until 30 June 2004, 609 people were arrested under the Terrorism Act 2000. 61 of these were charged under the Act and 38 under both the Terrorism Act and other legislation. The remainder were either released without charge, bailed to return, cautioned, charged under other legislation (such as that for murder, grievous bodily harm and use of firearms or explosives), or dealt with under immigration or mental health legislation. Of the 99 individuals charged under the Terrorism Act, 15 have been convicted.

The above figures now appear on the Home Office website and will be updated every six months.

Home Office Research Development and Statistics publish an annual Command Paper and supplementary volumes of criminal statistics. A breakdown of prosecutions and convictions under the Terrorism Act 2000 for 2001 and 2002 is in the accompanying table. Figures for 2003 will not be available until later in the year.

We are currently undertaking further work on the numbers of those arrested under the Terrorism Act 2000 and subsequently charged under other legislation. We will publish these figures once they are available. Previous estimates, which are likely to under-estimate those charged in this way, had suggested up to January 2004. Of the 530 people then arrested under the Terrorism Act, 263 are known to have been released without further sanction. Of the remaining 267, 165 had been charged (94 under the Act and 71 under other legislation). Others were released to immigration service detention, sectioned under the Mental Health Act, bailed, cautioned or at that point still not dealt with.

TimeBank and Do-It

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he plans to publish the research commissioned by his Department into (a) TimeBank and (b) Do-it. [186687]

Fiona Mactaggart: The Home Office research into the work of TimeBank and the do-it website was commissioned for internal Home Office use and it is not intended that it should be published in full, as it contains commercially sensitive information. However summaries of the main findings of this research are:

> TimeBank
> TimeBank's performance does not compare unfavourably with that of other Government funded programmes.
> TimeBank has managed to attract people into volunteering who have never volunteered before and has managed to broaden the base from which volunteers are recruited to some extent by attracting significant numbers of young people and people from black and minority ethnic communities.
> Perhaps its biggest success has been its targeted campaigns which have been extremely well received by the Campaign Partners, but less so by TimePartners.
> There are ongoing difficulties with the TimePartner system and the link-up with the do-it database.
>
> The functions of TimeBank and other key, strategic volunteering agencies such as do-it, the Community Channel and the National Centre for Volunteering overlap.
> do-it
> do-it has made a good start. In October 2001 it reported 9,000 page impressions per week, and by January 2002 it was up to 17,000. In March 2003 do-it was receiving 100,000 unique users per month. Opportunities cover a broad spectrum of service areas and skill levels.
> There are gaps in the evaluation that need to be addressed. There are currently no systematic data to indicate how many people have started to volunteer as a result of their contact with do-it, or indeed any feedback from users on the services that do-it provides.
> In the absence of user feedback, feedback from organisations was mixed. Three quarters of organisations that responded said they had received volunteers through do-it (average of 22 in the last year per organisation). Three in five organisations felt that do-it had been an effective recruitment tool.
> The capital modernisation scheme was felt to have been a great success, both by recipient organisations and representatives from the wider voluntary sector.

These issues are currently being addressed by both organisations.

Victim Support

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his Department's future funding plans are for Victim Support Services. [188487]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 14 September 2004]: In recent years the Home Office grant to victim support has more than doubled, from £11.7 million at the start of the financial year 1997–98 to £30 million in 2004–05. We anticipate that the level of Home Office funding for victim support will continue to be in the region of £30 million for 2005–06 and 2006–07.

Volunteers

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the number of (a) adults and (b) children who volunteer in the UK. [189398]

Fiona Mactaggart: According to the Home Office Citizenship Survey 2003, which covered England and Wales, 42 per cent. of people aged 16 and over (17.9 million people) volunteered formally[1] at least once in the 12 months before interview; and 28 per cent. (11.8 million people), at least once a month in the 12 months before interview. 62 per cent. of people aged 16 and over (26.4 million people) volunteered informally[2] at least once in the 12 months before interview; 37 per cent. (15.6 million people), at least once a month in the 12 months before interview.[3]

According to the Young People's Boost to the Home Office Citizenship Survey 2003, 63 per cent. of young people aged between 11 and 15 volunteered formally at least once in the 12 months before interview. For technical reasons it has not been possible to estimate the number of young people in England and Wales who volunteered formally.

There is no comparable information available for formal and informal volunteering in the UK. The main report of findings from the Home Office Citizenship Survey 2003 will be published shortly by the Home Office. The report of findings from the Young People's Boost will be published shortly by the Department for Education and Skills.

Reports of findings from the Home Office Citizenship Survey 2001 and 2003 have been placed in the House of Commons Library.

[1] Formal volunteering is defined as giving help unpaid through groups, clubs or organisations to benefit other people or the environment.

[2] Informal volunteering is defined as giving help unpaid as individuals to others who were not members of their families.

[3] Estimates of the numbers of people volunteering formally and informally were based on 2002-based projections of population for 2003 provided by the Government Actuary's Department.

Work Permits (Care Homes)

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many work permit applications were received in respect of the residential care home sector in each of the last three years for which figures are available. [189308]

Mr. Browne: It is not possible to identify the number of work permit applications received in respect of the residential care home sector without incurring disproportionate cost.

Young Offenders

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many young offenders aged 18 to 21 have been moved between prisons on overcrowding drafts (a) this year and (b) in each of the last five years. [187230]

Paul Goggins: This information on overcrowding drafts is not available, as the reasons for transfers are not recorded centrally.

Altogether there were around 13,000 inter-prison transfers of young prisoners (aged 18 to 20) in 2003–04. As this figure refers to all movements in this period, it may include some young prisoners who were transferred more than once during this period. It is not possible to identify how many of these transfers were on overcrowding drafts, although the considerable majority will have been the result of normal sentence planning procedures.

Information on inter-prison transfers of young prisoners in previous years was not centrally recorded and is not available.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many youths under the age of 18 from the Buckingham constituency have been held in young offenders rehabilitation centres in each year since 2001. [189859]

Paul Goggins: The number of young people under 18 remanded in or sentenced to custody by Buckinghamshire courts since 2001 is shown in the table, together with the types of establishment they were held in. We do not have separate information for the Buckingham constituency.

	Remanded[1]			Sentenced
	STC	LASCH	YOI	STC	LASCH	YOI
2001	0	0	4	1	1	15
2002	0	3	4	1	1	23
2003	0	1	0	1	2	7
2004	1	1	0	2	0	9

[1] to avoid double counting, young people remanded in custody who were later given a custodial sentence are shown in the remanded column only.

STCs are Secure Training Centres; LASCHs are Local Authority Secure Children's Homes (the data on both these come from the Youth Justice Board) and YOIs are Prison Service Young Offender Institutions (the data on these come from the Prison Service).

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Public Swimming Pools

Kate Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what action she has taken to ensure that access to public swimming pools in London increases; [186923]

(2) what action she (a) can and (b) will take to increase the number of swimming pools in London. [186924]

Mr. Caborn [pursuant to his reply, 7 September 2004, Official Report, c. 1226W]: The Amateur Swimming Association (ASA) is one of the 12 National Governing Bodies (NGB) able to bid for Community Club Development Programme funding from a budget of £20 million. £1.66 million has been earmarked for each NGB's ability to propose and deliver projects that meet the criteria of the programme.

I regret that in my previous answer I intimated that the ASA would receive £1.6 million from the Community Club Development Programme without first having to meet the set criteria for the Programme.

Television Licences

Anne Picking: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many care homes in the UK are (a) eligible for and (b) in receipt of block television reception licences for sheltered housing. [190149]

Estelle Morris: The Accommodation for Residential Care concessionary scheme is open to nursing and residential homes and sheltered housing schemes which meet the qualifying criteria set out in the television licence fee regulations. 28,028 such establishments held concessionary licences at the end of August 2004, as recorded by TV Licensing. Entitlement to the concession can be determined only on receipt of an application; no information is therefore available on the eligibility of establishments which have not applied.

Tom Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many people are in receipt of a free television licence in the United Kingdom over the age of 75 years. [190259]

Estelle Morris: At the end of August 2004, approximately 3.5 million people aged 75 or over were in receipt of a free television licence. In addition, just under 400,000 over-75s living in housing covered by Accommodation for Residential Care group licences had their £5 fee waived under the free licence scheme.

DEFENCE

Departmental Spending

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much (a) his Department and (b) agencies of the Department have spent on electricity use in each year since 1997. [181373]

Mr. Caplin: The amounts spent by the Ministry of Defence in the UK on the purchase of electricity are:

	£ million
1997–98	112.0
1998–99	110.0
1999–2000	101.7
2000–01	96.1

These figures are VAT exclusive at current prices. Comparable figures are not available after 2000–01 as the Ministry of Defence moved to reporting of aggregated utilities (gas, electricity and water supply) expenditure in the Departmental Resources and Accounts. However details of expenditure on utilities is published in the National Statistics Publication: UK Defence Statistics 2003: Table 1.8 Defence Expenditure Outturn in the UK by Industry Group. A copy is available in the Library of the House.

Freedom of Information Act

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department is implementing the full terms of the Freedom of Information Act 2000. [189788]

Mr. Caplin: With the exception of the Special Forces and any military unit assisting GCHQ, the Ministry of Defence and the armed forces are subject to the Freedom of Information Act 2000. As such, we will comply with the duties which the Act places on all public authorities. In accordance with the timetable announced in November 2001, the first phase of implementation was achieved in November 2002 when MOD's Publication Scheme was made available. The general right of access to information will be implemented from 1 January 2005.

Military Aircraft

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the average annual operating cost is per (a) Tornado GR, (b) Jaguar GR1/A/3/3A, (c) Jaguar T2A/T4 and (d) Tornado F3; and what the estimated average operating cost is per Eurofighter. [190056]

Mr. Ingram: The average annual operating cost per aircraft is as follows:

	£ million
Tornado GR4	10.4
Jaguar GR1/3	5.6
Jaguar T2/4	5.5
Tornado F3	9.1

The estimated cost for the Eurofighter Typhoon is £4.7 million for 2004–05. This annual average will increase over time as the number of hours flown by each aircraft increases.

The figures in the table are based on the Actual Operating Fleet (average annual number of aircraft available to the RAF).

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the average annual support cost is per (a) Tornado GR, (b) Jaguar GR1/A/3/3A, (c) Jaguar T2A/T4 and (d) Tornado F3; and what the estimated average support cost is per Eurofighter. [190057]

Mr. Ingram: The average annual cost incurred by the Defence Logistics Organisation (at 2004–05 prices) to support a Tornado aircraft is £1.6 million and £1.5 million for the Jaguar. As many of the spares and much of the equipment used to support an aircraft fleet is common across all variants, it is not possible to accurately attribute costs to individual marks of aircraft.

Based on through-life support estimates it is expected that the total, Defence-wide, annual average support cost (at 2004–05 prices) for a Eurofighter aircraft will be £2.2 million.

As part of our drive to transform logistics we are working with industry to reduce the costs of supporting in-service aircraft, including the future fast-jet fleet.

Provigil

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what quantities of Provigil and similar drugs have been purchased by his Department in each of the last five years; and at what cost. [187495]

Mr. Caplin: The quantity and cost of Provigil purchased by the MOD in the last five years is as follows:

Financial Year (1 April to 31 March)	Volume of purchase (30 × 100mg pack)	Average price per pack excluding VAT (£)	Total (£)
1999	141	52.21	7,361.61
2000	52	53.85	2,800.20
2001	175	53.85	9,423.75
2002	146	53.85	7,862.10
2003	89	53.85	4,792.65
2004 (to date)	117	53.85	6,300.45
Total	[1]720	—	38,540.76

[1] 720 packs x 30 tablets = 21,600 tablets.

Renewable Energy (Departmental Use)

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of electricity used by buildings in (a) his Department and (b) its agencies has come from renewable sources in each year since 1997. [181291]

Mr. Caplin: The Ministry of Defence and its agencies did not purchase any electricity from climate change levy exempt sources until 2002–03 when 2.8 per cent. was acquired from such sources. The estimate for 2003–04 is 5 per cent. based on the minimum percentage specified in electricity supply contracts. Actual figures for 2003–04 are not yet available.

Territorial Army

Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what (a) the total strength of the Territorial Army, (b) the number of mobilised reservists and (c) the current Territorial Army deployment figures are. [189804]

Mr. Caplin: The information is as follows:

As at 1 September 2004:

(a) the total strength of Territorial Army was 35,480;

(b) the number of Army mobilised Regular Reservists was 100;

(c) the number of mobilised TA personnel was 2,200.

Iraq

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his oral statement of 10 May 2004, Official Report, columns 21–39, on Iraq, whether the routine hooding of prisoners in UK facilities in Iraq was contrary to instructions; on what basis the routine hooding was authorised, and by whom; whether hooding continues of Iraqis by UK forces outside UK facilities; whether hooding by UK forces outside facilities is contrary to instructions; and if he will make a statement. [173024]

Mr. Hoon: Prisoners held in UK detention facilities in Iraq have not, at any time, been routinely hooded.

Hooding was discontinued in Iraq when there was no longer a military justification for continuing the practice. Hooding during arrest and transit is acceptable when there is a strong military reason to do it, for example to offer security to our own forces and locations or to protect the detainee (by preventing identification by other detainees).

Welsh Regiments

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many regiments will be based in Wales following the review of the infantry. [189710]

Mr. Ingram: Details of the new infantry structure and the associated implications for the Army's basing strategy are currently being worked through by the Army and the hon. Member will understand that I cannot pre-empt this work. Further announcements will be made before the end of this year.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

English Heritage

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will evaluate the quality of the advice given to his Department by English Heritage. [190165]

Keith Hill: English Heritage provides the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister with advice on a range of matters. These include the review of the planning system, and characterisation of growth areas. The Government are satisfied with the advice provided, and does not see the need for a more formal evaluation.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Disabled People (Departmental Initiatives)

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the major initiatives his Department has undertaken since 1997 in relation to disabled people. [188152]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions on 16 September 2004, Official Report, column 1738W. In addition to the Government initiatives that he has already outlined, I would like to set out in more detail some of the work my Department is delivering in this important area.

The Green Paper "Every Child Matters" set out a vision for children's services, which included proposals to provide education, health, and social care around the needs of the child rather than the needs of professionals. It proposed that new Children's Director posts be established in each local authority with responsibility for education and social care and the development of Children's Trusts to commission multi-agency services including health, education and social care. A number of Children Trust Pilots were set up to test how this could work. This has included eight Children's Trusts who are focusing on services for disabled children.

Proposals in the Green Paper for a common assessment framework, improving information sharing and providing lead professionals for children with complex needs, will particularly benefit disabled children and their families. The Green Paper has also set out some specific commitments on disabled children around improving early intervention, family support, education and transition services.

The National Service Framework for children was published last month. This is a joint DH/DfES publication. The national standards in the NSF provide a coherent and integrated approach to services for disabled children. They will help ensure better access and smoother progression in the provision of services for children, from initial contact with the NHS, via a GP surgery or NHS hospital, through to social services support and education.

We have provided ring-fenced Sure Start funding to local authorities for disabled children in early years settings, and ensured such settings pay due regard to the SEN code of practice. This includes the introduction of Special Needs Coordinators, (SENCOs), for early years provision. The Disability Discrimination Act was also amended to include Government funded nursery education and child-care provision within its duties, along with general education.

As a result of the Special Education Needs and Disability Act (SENDA) 2001, schools are under a duty not to discriminate against disabled pupils for a reason relating to their disability. They must:

not treat disabled pupils less favourably, without justification, than pupils and students who are not disabled; and make reasonable adjustments to ensure that disabled pupils and students are not put at a substantial disadvantage in comparison to those who are not disabled.

Schools and local education authorities (LEAs) are also under a duty to plan strategically to increase access to schools for disabled pupils and must publish accessibility plans (schools) and accessibility strategies (LEAs). The duty covers improvements to physical access, access to the curriculum, and access to information in alternative formats.

"Removing Barriers to Achievement", published this year, set out a long term vision for SEN and a programme of action to improve outcomes for children with SEN and disabilities. It included the development of a strategy to improve childcare for families with disabled children and practical tools to support schools in carrying out their statutory duties towards disabled pupils.

New duties were also placed on those bodies responsible for Further and Higher Education Institutions, Adult and Community Learning and Statutory Youth Services by SENDA. These duties include:

it being unlawful to discriminate against disabled students by treating them less favourably than others; making provision for reasonable adjustments, including the accessibility of course materials, where disabled students might otherwise be substantially disadvantaged; from 2005, the need to adapt the physical features of premises.

In addition, Section 13 of the Learning and Skills Act 2000 requires the Learning and Skills Council (LSC) to pay particular regard to the needs of young people and adults with learning difficulties and disabilities (LDD) when exercising its functions. Section 14 requires the LSC to have due regard to the promotion of equality of opportunity between people with a disability and people without.

From 1 October 2004 the Disability Discrimination Act has been extended to provide protection to people undertaking vocational qualifications. Organisations which award qualifications will be prohibited from discriminating against disabled people, must make reasonable adjustments in the assessment of candidates and must be able to demonstrate that competency standards represent a proportionate way of achieving a legitimate aim and do not unnecessarily discriminate. This provides a link between the employment provisions in Part II and those covering vocational training provided by Part IV and SENDA so that the legislation extends across all aspects of work and vocational training.

Since 1997, the number of Disabled Students Allowance (DSA) awards—grants to help pay for the extra course-related costs which students in higher education may incur because of a disability or specific learning difficulty—has increased from 8,123 (expenditure £10.4 million) in 1996–97 to 47,523 (expenditure £54.9 million) in 2002–03. DSAs are not income-assessed and are paid in addition to the package of support for living costs available to other students. From 2005–06 DSAs are to be extended for the first time to full-time undergraduate students undertaking distance-learning courses.

Further details of all of these initiatives can be found in the DfES Departmental Reports on the DfES website http://www.dfes.gov.uk/

Education Maintenance Allowance

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the age bar for children who are not 16 in the requisite time period for the eligibility for education maintenance allowance; what leniency in determining awards is allowed; and what plans he has to change existing arrangements. [190211]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: We took the decision to phase in EMA from September 2004 to successive 16-year-old age groups rather than immediately offer the award to all young people in Further Education. There were good reasons for doing so. The main purpose of EMA is to encourage students to stay on in learning when otherwise they would have dropped out, and the older students already in education have already made that choice. The main exception is that young people who received EMA under the pilot arrangements are eligible to apply for EMA under the national scheme. We are keeping the EMA scheme arrangements under review but do not envisage any significant changes to the eligibility criteria for 2005–06.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills why educational maintenance allowance eligibility is based on the previous tax year; and if he will make a statement. [190212]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Assessing EMA entitlement on the household income for the previous financial year provides the most complete and secure assessment of household income. If the household income decreases significantly within the year then the young person can apply for assistance under the Learner Support Fund.

David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) which variant of the education maintenance allowances pilot schemes was selected for implementation in England; [190371]

(2) what financial assistance is available to students in sixth form education whose birth date falls before 1 September 1987. [190419]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: We tested eight different variants of EMA in 56 LEA pilot areas. The national EMA scheme draws on the evidence from the pilots but is not based on any single variant. Students who are resident within one of the 56 pilot areas and whose date of birth falls before 1 September 1987 may be entitled to EMA. Those young people whose date of birth falls before 1 September 1987 and who are not resident within a pilot area are entitled to apply for Learner Support funds.

FE Colleges

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assessment he has made of (a) the cost of the strategic area reviews of further education colleges and (b) the effect of the five-year plan on the progress of the reviews. [190079]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The Learning and Skills Council (LSC) was established in 2001 to plan and fund post-16 education and training. LSC led strategic area reviews (StARs) were introduced in April 2003 and are an integral part of this planning role. No extra funding was allocated to carry out these reviews and it is therefore not possible to disaggregate their specific cost from the overall cost of the wide range of planning activities carried out by local LSCs.

The DfES's five-year strategy published in July sets out our vision for an education and skills system to meet the needs of the 21st century. The StAR process supports this vision by mapping local provision and identifying the balance of provision there needs to be in a locality. The progress of the StAR process has not been affected in anyway by the five-year strategy and is still expected to complete in spring 2005 as originally planned.

Plumbing

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) whether providers of NVQ2 in plumbing are able to supply sufficient numbers of qualified assessors for students to be able to continue with their qualifications; and if he will make a statement on the requirement for workplace assessment; [190013]

(2) what the ratio is of qualified assessors to students with regard to the NVQ2 in plumbing, broken down by each institution that offers this qualification; [190014]

(3) how many providers are no longer able to offer NVQ2 for plumbing in the current academic year due to not being able to meet its required rates of qualified assessors to students. [190016]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The information on the ratio of qualified assessors to learners is not available within the Department.

The organisation of assessment arrangements is for the awarding bodies in conjunction with the centres which they have approved to deliver their qualifications, which in the case of the NVQ2 in plumbing is City and Guilds.

The assessment strategies that must be implemented in NVQs are specified by the appropriate Sector Skills Council or sector body and approved by the regulatory authorities.

Pupil Exclusions

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many decisions taken by schools in Buckinghamshire permanently to exclude pupils were reversed by independent appeals panels in each year since 2000–01. [189842]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The requested information is given in the following table.

Figures for 2003–04 are not yet available. In January 2003 we reformed the legislation governing exclusion appeal panels to strike a better balance between the interests of the individual pupil and those of the school community as a whole. We changed the composition of independent appeal panels to include more members with experience of school life. Our guidance is that panels should not normally reinstate excluded pupils for a range of offences, including threatened or actual violence.

Sustainable Development Action Plan

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when he expects to fill the post of coordinator for the Sustainable Development Action Plan; and if he will make a statement. [190220]

Mr. Charles Clarke: An appointment is in the process of being made and will be confirmed shortly.

HOME DEPARTMENT

ASBOs (Buckingham)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) antisocial behaviour orders and (b) curfew orders have been made in the Buckingham constituency since the commencement of the schemes. [189857]

Ms Blears: The information is as follows.

(a) Antisocial behaviour orders (ASBOs) have been available to the courts since 1 April 1999. From commencement, up to 31 March 2004 (latest available), the Home Office has been notified of three ASBOs issued where restrictions imposed are specific to Aylesbury Vale district council area of which the Buckingham constituency forms a part.

(b) The table shows the number of curfew orders with and without electronic monitoring made at courts in the County of Buckinghamshire from 1996 to 2002. Court proceedings data for2003 will be available in November. It is not possible from the data available centrally to identify those made in the Buckingham constituency.

	Adults	Juveniles
1997	—	—
1998	—	—
1999	—	1
2000	10	9
2001	21	25
2002	38	25
Total	69	60

[1] Electronic and non-electronic orders.

No applications have yet been received to establish a local child curfew scheme under section 14 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. Some local authorities and police forces have considered the possibility but concluded that other measures should be taken to tackle relevant local problems.

Contestability

Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how contestability differs from (a) market testing and (b) privatisation. [168393]

Paul Goggins: Contestability means obtaining the best value for money and the most effective supervision, punishment and care of offenders by opening up the prison and probation service to competition. We aim to engage the public, private, voluntary and 'not for profit' sectors, both in prison and the community, so that we can enhance public protection and deliver the most effective and efficient management of offenders. Market Testing, which has already been used successfully in the Prison Service and has demonstrated that public services can compete effectively with the private sector, is only one of a number of ways of achieving that aim.

Privatisation, which means selling a publicly provided service to the private sector, is not being considered.

CS Gas

Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many reported injuries have resulted from police use of CS gas spray in each of the last five years; and how many of those injured were police officers; [189505]

(2) how many complaints have been received in connection with the use of CS gas spray by police officers in England and Wales in each of the last five years; and what the outcome of each complaint was. [189506]

Ms Blears: Information about the number and outcome of police complaints received relating to specific situations is not held centrally by the Home Office. It could therefore be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Similarly, information about the number of injuries caused by police use of CS spray is not centrally held, and could again be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Dangerous Driving

David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans there are to review the status of witnesses in cases of dangerous driving. [187387]

Caroline Flint: The Association of Chief Police Officer's Road Death Investigation Manual aims to achieve consistent professional investigation of incidents. In the early stages of investigation, one of the most important sources of evidence may be the identification of witnesses. The manual provides guidance to practitioners on how to gather evidence and secure the accounts of witnesses.

The 'No Witness No Justice Project' aims to deliver a more customer-focused service to victims and witnesses to enable more witnesses to give evidence and increase victims and witness satisfaction.

Different approaches to support services for incidents that lead to death or serious injury are being piloted. The pilots are subject to independent evaluation and will inform national standards of care for people affected by road death and serious injury.

Departmental Recycling

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the latest available 12 month figures are for the proportion of the Department's redundant documentation, waste paper and card that is recycled; and if he will make a statement on the Department's recycling policy. [188689]

Fiona Mactaggart: The information requested is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. All areas of the Department participate in recycling but the way in which it is carried out and the types of materials recycled varies. For the central London estate the waste is sorted by specialist contractors after collection and waste paper and card, among other materials, are extracted for recycling. The overall recycling rate is around 25 per cent. Confidential waste paper is collected separately, shredded and then recycled.

We are currently developing a strategy in response to the waste targets recently published under the Framework for Sustainable Development on the Government Estate. This strategy will cover how we will centrally collect waste data. A summary of the strategy will be published on the Home Office website by the end of October.

Journalists

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans the Government have to ensure journalists are able to protect their sources. [186756]

Estelle Morris [holding answer 13 September 2004]: I have been asked to reply.

Section 10 of the Contempt of Court Act protects people, including journalists, from revealing their sources. In addition, the industry's voluntary Code of Practice, administered by the Press Complaints Commission, recognises that journalists have a moral obligation to protect confidential sources of information. The Government have no plans for further legislation in this area.

Name that Tag Campaign

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have called Crimestoppers in connection with the Name that Tag campaign; what the duration of the campaign was; how many tags were published over the course of the campaign; how many police investigations are under way as a result; and what the total cost of the campaign was. [190046]

Ms Blears: In addition to approximately 130 calls to Crime Watch UK when name that tag was first publicised, 35 actionable calls have been made to Crimestoppers in connection with the Name that Tag campaign.

The campaign, with posters displaying 12 tags, initially ran for three months beginning in November 2003 but it has been left open-ended as the posters have generated more information and they are in fact still on display. Since my hon. Friend Paul Goggins' answer to the hon. Member on 7 September 2004, Official Report, column 813W two people have been arrested as a result of the campaign. A further nine people are at various stages of investigation relating to the published tags, and a further seven prolific taggers are also under police investigation. The initiative cost to the Home Office was £3,000.

Police

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people are employed (a) directly and (b) indirectly, by (i) the Police Complaints Commission for England and Wales and (ii) HM Inspectorate of Constabulary for England and Wales. [189664]

Ms Blears [holding answer 11 October 2004]: It is assumed that the Police Complaints Commission for England and Wales referred to is the Independent Police Complaints Commission (IPCC) which was established under the Police Reform Act 2002 and commenced operations on 1 April 2004. This body replaced the Police Complaints Authority (PCA) which ceased operations on 31 March 2004.

The information requested is as follows:

	Indirectly employed (secondees and public appointees)	Directly employed (all other staff)
IPCC	30	239
HMIC	63	66

Brian Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police stations have (a) opened and (b) closed in Avon and Somerset in each year since 1979. [188667]

Ms Blears: The management of the police estate and allocation of resources are matters for each Police Authority and the Chief Officer.

The Chief Constable for Avon and Somerset Police informs me that reliable information, available only from 1992–93, is as follows:

Financial Year	Opened	Closed
1993–94	0	13
1994–95	0	6
1995–96	0	14
1996–97	0	13
1997–98	2	1
1998–99	3	0
2000–01	2	0

Financial Year	Opened	Closed
2001–02	2	0
2002–03	1	1
2003–04	0	0

Notes:

1. A police station is defined as an operational police facility with a public enquiry counter open during the day.

2. In March 2004, there were 43 police stations in Avon and Somerset.

In addition to the station openings above, Avon and Somerset have recently introduced six mobile police stations.

The closure of police stations in the early 1990s was part of a force modernisation programme. Divisional boundaries were reviewed, assets were streamlined, and a number of local beat stations were closed. Sale proceeds increased the police capital programme, including further enhancement of district stations to improve service.

Between 2000–01 and 2003–04 Avon and Somerset Police Authority invested over £11 million directly in Land and Buildings[1].

Avon and Somerset also provide public access through Beat Surgeries in public buildings such as libraries and community centres and in busy shopping centres.

Mr. Ivan Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the changes in police officer numbers in Essex has been since 1997. [186317]

Ms Blears [holding answer 7 September 2004]: On 31 May 2004 Essex police had 3,130 police officers, a record number and 169 more than in March 1997. The table shows strength for each year since March 1997.

Essex police: strength March 1997 to May 2004

As at 31 March)	Police number[1]	Change in strength	Percentage
1997	2,961	—	—
1998	2,928	-33	(-1.1)
1999	2,891	-37	(-1.3)
2000	2,806	-85	(-2.9)

2002	2,946	+59	(+2)
2003	[3]2,989	+43	(+1.6)
2004	3,098	+109	(+3.6)
2004 (31 August)	3,106	+8	(+0.26)

[1] Source for 1997 to March 2004 is the Home Office Research, Development and Statistics Directorate (RDS). August 2004 was collected separately outside of the normal data collection arrangements and has not been subject to the same validation as RDS data.

[2] Boundary changes with the Metropolitan police on 1 April 2000 contributed to the increase in police officer strength during 2000–01.

[3] This corrects information provided in the Official Report, column 876, where "all officers" for 31 March 2003 had been provided in error, rather than "all officers (excl. career brakes and maternity leave)".

Prisons

Ross Cranston: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many equal pay cases have been taken against the Prison Service in England and Wales in each year since 1997. [187958]

Paul Goggins: The number of claims for each year are:

1997	0
1998	0
1999	998
2000	310
2001	5
2002	359
2003	12
2004	87

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what rationale underlay the decision to permit prisoners serving life sentences to buy national lottery tickets; and if he will make a statement. [188575]

Paul Goggins: No one, including those serving a life sentence is permitted to buy national lottery tickets while they are in prison. The ticket purchased recently by a life sentence prisoner who won the Lotto (the National Lottery) was purchased while that individual was released from prison on temporary licence.

Temporary licences are granted as part of the resettlement process for those prisoners who are reaching the end of their sentence and are preparing for release. Under the terms of a temporary licence, a prisoner is bound by certain conditions aimed at preventing further offending and any antisocial behaviour. If these conditions are broken, they are recalled to prison immediately. The purchase of lottery tickets is not prohibited by the licence conditions.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the pay scales are for (a) administrative officers in the Prison Service and (b) prison officers; and what job evaluation exercises have been carried out by the Prison Service in respect of administrative posts in the past five years. [189867]

Paul Goggins: The pay scale for Administrative Officers in the Prison Service is £12,502-£15,415. That for Prison Officers is £16,896-£24,868, with Long Service Increments rising to £25,788.

The Prison Service introduced Phase 1 of its review of pay and grading in July 2000. This affected 2,500 middle and senior managers, including those in administrative and operational disciplines, and replaced more than 150 existing grades with a seven-payband common.

Development of Phase 2 of the review, which would have included administrative posts, was halted in April 2002, with the project work subsumed within pay modernisation.

To date, the Prison Service has carried out 507 individual job evaluations. The system evaluates the job and not the individual job-holder, so it is not possible to identify how many of these jobs were held by administrative grades without incurring disproportionate cost.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to the answer of 22 July 2004, Official Report, columns 610–11W, on prisons, if he will make it mandatory that prison staff who wish to become prison healthcare officers obtain the relevant qualifications before taking up the posts; and if he will make a statement. [187477]

Paul Goggins: There are no present plans to do so. However, the Prison Service continues to discuss with stakeholders the future options for healthcare officers, including training.

Special Constables

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes have been made to the (a) management, (b) welfare and (c) deployment of special constables in the Thames Valley area since January 2002. [189972]

Ms Blears: Chief Officers have responsibility for the management, welfare and deployment of their Special Constabularies.

Stop and Search (West Yorkshire)

Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were stopped and searched by West Yorkshire Police during 2002–03, broken down by (a) age, (b) ethnicity and (c) sex. [189503]

Ms Blears: During 2002–03 the total number of persons stopped and searched by West Yorkshire Police under Section 5 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 was 46,707. Of these, 37,255 had their visual appearance recorded as white, 2,901 as black, 5,830 as Asian, and 721 as of 'other' ethnicity.

In the same period, a further 1,155 persons were stopped and searched under Section 60 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994. Of these, 607 were white, 82 black, 435 Asian, and 31 of 'other' ethnicity.

Stops and searches under the provisions of Section 44 of the Terrorism Act 2000 during 2002–03 totalled 18, 13 of white individuals, two of Asians, and three of persons of 'Other' ethnicity.

No information is recorded centrally on the age and sex of those stopped and searched.

Young Offenders

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer 187060 of 7 September 2004, Official Report, column 965W, how many (a) female and (b) male young offenders aged 18 to 21 years were held (i) over 50 miles and (ii) over 100 miles from their committal court town. [190061]

Paul Goggins: As at 7 July 2004, from the information available, the distance that young offenders aged 18 to 21 years, male and female, were held from their committal court towns is set out in the table.

Distance	Total young offender population	Male young offender population	Female young offender population
Under 50 miles
Total number of prisoners	5,184	4,976	208
Percentage	65	66	51
50–100 miles
Total number of prisoners	1,828	1,732	96
Percentage	23	23	23
100 plus miles
Total number of prisoners	944	837	107
Percentage	12	11	26
Total	7,956	7,545	411

Note:

An individual prisoner's court details are recorded to show first court appearance, committal, remand, conviction or sentencing courts. Information specifically on committal court details is not available for all prisoners and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Where a prisoner's committal court data is unavailable, the prisoner's remand court or convicting and sentencing court is used.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

Summer Works Programme

Sir John Butterfill: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission what assessment he has made of the health and safety implications for (a) Members, (b) Members' staff, (c) staff of the House and (d) the general public of allowing access to areas in which work was continuing as part of the summer works programme, with particular reference to risks arising from storage of timber and flammable liquids in the Committee Corridor. [189983]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: The Head of the Parliamentary Occupational Health, Safety and Welfare Services has carried out an investigation into the health and safety arrangements relevant to works projects during the summer recess 2004. In summary, his findings were that:

> The health and safety arrangements in connection with construction projects were generally to acceptable standards.
> Health and safety in construction projects undertaken on the Parliamentary Estate has significantly improved over recent years.
> The stairs leading to the Members' Tea Room, though unsightly, were found to be in a safe condition for use.
> There have been no reported accidents related to non construction staff during the summer recess period; and no significant incidents at all, which overall is a good record.
> There are a number of learning points where improvements can be made for future construction projects, in particular better cordoning off and signage for construction related areas.

At the time of the investigation, there were no flammable liquids or timber stored in the Committee Corridor. However, observation by others during the peak period of the works projects confirms that flammable liquids were securely stored in line with good practice and timber was stored temporarily in cordoned off areas for short periods prior to use.

The full report is lodged in the House of Commons Library and copies have been sent to Mr Speaker and to the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee.

Sir John Butterfill: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission pursuant to his answer of 9 September 2004, Official Report, column 1330W, on September sittings, if he will estimate the cost of the summer works programme had the September sitting of the House not taken place; and what the actual cost will be. [189984]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: The estimated cost of the summer works programme for 2004 is some £5.7 million against a figure of around £5.6 million if the House had not sat in September.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Caucasus (Oil Pipelines)

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will make a statement on the status of the Baku-Tblisi-Ceyhan pipeline; and what diplomatic discussions he has had with those countries involved on the likely outcome of this project. [190213]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: The pipeline is a matter for routine discussion between UK Government Ministers and officials with interlocutors in Azerbaijan, Georgia and Turkey. The pipeline, which is currently under construction, will be the first to transport oil from the Caspian direct to the Mediterranean, thus reducing the amount of fuel, which would otherwise be passing through the congested and environmentally hazardous Bosphorus. The pipeline and its route is a commercial matter between BTC Pipeline Company and the host countries.

More broadly, the UK Government have been actively involved in discussions between companies, civil society and the Government of Azerbaijan on Azerbaijan's involvement in the Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative, a UK-led international initiative to ensure transparency over revenues from the oil, gas and mining sectors.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what funding the Government has made available to the Baku-Tblisi-Ceyhan pipeline. [190214]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: The British Government are not providing direct funding for the Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan (BTC) project.

The UK Government are a shareholder of International Finance Corporation (IFC) and European Bank for Reconstruction and Development (EBRD). Both organisations are providing commercial loans of US$250 million.

The Export Credits Guarantee Department (ECGD) has provided cover for a US$106 million line of credit to finance UK contractors involved in the BTC project. This does not involve direct lending from ECGD, but an ECGD guarantee of commercial bank lending to the project.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development which countries have expressed opposition to the Baku-T'blisi-Ceyhan pipe line; what discussions he has had with the (a) World Bank and (b) European Bank for Reconstruction and Development on the British position regarding the pipe line; and if he will make a statement. [190215]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: The Governments of the countries concerned (Azerbaijan, Georgia and Turkey) have all signed agreements governing the building and operation of the pipeline. DFID has not received any representations from any governments expressing opposition to the pipeline.

DFID Ministers approved the International Finance Corporation (IFC) and European Bank for Reconstruction and Development (EBRD) UK Executive Directors support for the project at the Executive Board meetings in November 2003. There is ongoing dialogue with the IFC and EBRD to ensure lessons learnt from this project inform future policies and projects funded by the Banks.

Hurricane Ivan

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance is being provided by the UK Government for the consequences of Hurricane Ivan in the Cayman Islands. [190275]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: Following the impact of the hurricane, HMS Richmond and the Royal Fleet Auxiliary Wave Ruler began helping the relief effort at the earliest opportunity. DFID also responded to an urgent request from the Government of the Cayman Islands by providing urgent relief items, including plastic sheeting. DFID has since sent flights containing potable water, hygiene materials and other requested items. The cost of this direct assistance is about £200,000. DFID has also contributed £500,000 to the International Federation of the Red Cross regional appeal, for the provision of emergency food, shelter needs, water and sanitation and various non-food items. The Regional Appeal includes support to 1,000 affected families in Cayman Islands for six months.

The British Government are providing £100,000 towards the costs associated with the deployment of a contingent from the Bermuda Regiment who are currently helping with the continuing clean up on the Islands. We have also provided advisory support including a Law Enforcement Adviser, a Disaster Preparedness Adviser and reinforced the Governor's office.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much additional resources have been made available to (a) Grenada, (b) the Cayman Islands and (c) the Caribbean region as a result of Hurricane Ivan. [190276]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To date, DFID has committed around £3.4 million of assistance to the Caribbean region including our share of European Community commitments, following the impact of Hurricane Ivan on affected countries. Of this approximately £840,000 and £300,000 have been provided in direct support to relief needs in Grenada and Cayman Islands respectively. In addition to this assistance, HMS Richmond and RFA Wave Ruler were deployed to both islands to offer and provide immediate humanitarian support. We are considering further support to affected countries through United Nation agencies, the International Federation of the Red Cross and non-governmental organisations.

The European Community has announced it is mobilising £4.65 million in emergency relief and post emergency rehabilitation to help Grenada focusing on the provision of emergency shelter, food, water and other key supplies for 5,000 homeless families. It includes funds to be mobilized under the ninth European Development Fund, that are expected to be utilised primarily for school rehabilitation. The United Kingdom's share of this European Community assistance is about £700,000. The European Commission has also pledged £830,000 to Jamaica through its Humanitarian Aid Office, focusing on reducing the number of persons in temporary shelters and providing alternative accommodation for those currently housed in schools. The United Kingdom's share of this support is about £150,000. The European Community has announced a contribution of £1 million towards emergency relief in Haiti. The United Kingdom share of this humanitarian assistance is approximately £180,000.

The World Bank is providing £5.55 million to Grenada from its contingency facility for regional disaster management. The Caribbean Development Bank (CDB) has provided a £55,475 grant and £277,360 soft loan to Grenada for short-term disaster recovery. The Inter-American Development Bank has provided a £111,000 grant through the Caribbean Development Bank. The Inter-American Development Bank is providing a £111,000 technical assistance grant for Jamaica.

The Caribbean Development Bank has offered up to £277,360 in concessional lending to each of the affected member countries in the region, along with a £55,475 assessment grant via the Caribbean Disaster Emergency Response Agency for each country.

Latin America

Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will make a statement on the Department's aims, objectives and activities in Latin America. [190304]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: DFID recently finalised its Regional Assistance Plan for Latin America 2004–2007, which lays out our strategy for DFID's bilateral programme in the region. Its goal is to reduce poverty and inequality in the region, by enhancing the impact of international community support for poverty reduction, focusing on the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) and the World Bank.

DFID will work to improve the effectiveness of the contributions the IDB and World Bank make in creating economic opportunities for poor people and in making public services and political systems accountable and responsible to poor people. We will do so through a combination of direct support for the IDB and World Bank and working with other organisations in the region.

In addition, DFID will help to improve the coherence of donor support for governments' poverty reduction strategies and will also contribute to lesson sharing on key global policy issues,-particularly trade policies that better reflect the impact of trade on poverty and inequality, and improved quality and effectiveness of HIV/AIDS prevention, treatment and care.

DFID will retain a bilateral programme in Nicaragua to reflect its low-income status and vulnerability. British non-governmental organisations (NGOs) will be important partners in achieving our goal. An additional £7 million a year will be provided to NGOs with Partnership Programme Agreements with DFID for their work in Latin America and the Caribbean.

The Regional Assistance Plan will be formally launched later this month.

US Agencies (Sole-sourced Contracts)

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development whether the reports on audits of sole-sourced contracts that have already been undertaken by various US agencies requested by the International Advisory and Monitoring Board have been handed over; and if he will make a statement. [190231]

Hilary Benn: The International Advisory and Monitoring Board (IAMB) has requested copies of reports issued by the US Defence Contract Audit Agency on its audits of contracts for work in Iraq that included funding from the Development Fund for Iraq as well as US appropriated funds. I understand that, because the reports contain proprietary contractor commercial or financial information, including pricing data, the US Government are barred by US law from releasing this information without the permission of the company involved. I also understand that the US Government are working to resolve this issue.

SCOTLAND

Civil Service (Job Losses)

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which services within his Department will be (a) affected by and (b) subject to job losses consequent on the cuts in the civil service announced in the Spending Review. [189637]

Mrs. McGuire: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, on 16 September 2004, Official Report, column 1659W.

Departmental Recycling

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what the latest available 12 month figures are for the proportion of the Department's redundant documentation, waste paper and card that is recycled; and if he will make a statement on the Department's recycling policy. [188691]

Mrs. McGuire: The Scotland Office is committed to the recycling policy and targets set out in the Framework for Sustainable Development on the Government Estate. The precise information requested is not available; but a large majority of the waste paper and card produced by the Scotland Office is already consigned to re-cycling.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Export Credits Guarantee Department

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment her Department has made of the impact of the change of the Export Credits Guarantee Department to a statutory trading fund. [189786]

Mr. Alexander: The establishment of the Trading Fund, preceded by the pilot next year, should enable ECGD to take a more expansive approach to cover and an improved service to customers. There will be a parallel commitment to reduce premiums by up to £5 million per annum on cases where ECGD is currently charging above the internationally agreed minimum benchmark.

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate her Department has made of the likely volume of new business from the establishment of the Export Credits Guarantee Department (a) Pilot Trading Fund in April 2005 and (b) Statutory Trading Fund in April 2007. [189787]

Mr. Alexander: ECGD's new business in the last two financial years amounted to £3.5 billion (2002–03) and £2.99 billion (2003–04). When making her statement of 1 July 2004, Official Report, column 22WS, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry confirmed her commitment to the introduction of a Trading Fund with a capital framework designed to accommodate both business growth and risk volatility. The Chief Executive is analysing possible future business volumes.

Information and Communication Specialists

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many information and communication technology specialists are in full-time employment in the Department. [189595]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Department of Trade and Industry currently employs 69 (full-time equivalent) ICT specialists.

TRANSPORT

Humber Bridge Toll

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the cost of converting the toll system on the Humber Bridge so that tolls can be mainly collected automatically without the need for employing attendants. [189783]

Mr. Jamieson: The Secretary of State has made no such estimate. The Humber Bridge is not part of the trunk road network and is, therefore, not the direct responsibility of the Secretary of State. The financing and operation of the Bridge is primarily a matter for the board of local authorities who manage the bridge, the Humber Bridge Board.

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the cost was of employing persons to collect toll money on the Humber Bridge in each of the past four years for which figures are available. [189784]

Mr. Jamieson: The Department for Transport does not hold such information centrally. The Humber Bridge is not part of the trunk road network and is, therefore, not the direct responsibility of the Secretary of State. The financing and operation of the bridge is primarily a matter for the Humber Bridge Board.

Road Traffic Accidents

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many deaths in road traffic accidents there were in (a) 1975, (b) 1980, (c) 1990, (d) 2000 and (e) 2003. [189939]

Mr. Jamieson: The numbers of deaths in road traffic accidents are shown in the following table.

	Number killed
1975	6,366
1980	6,010
1990	5,217
2000	3,409
2003	3,508

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Union Presidency

15. Mr. David: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Lisbon Agenda will be one of the priorities of the British presidency of the EU. [190330]

Mr. MacShane: Yes it will be. Our overriding presidency priority will be to take forward the EU policy agenda in an efficient, effective and impartial way, with a strong emphasis on the agenda we inherit from preceding presidencies.

Delivering sustainable, long-term improvements to Europe's growth and employment is of course a major task for the EU and a priority for our presidency and the new Commission.

North Korea

16. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the impact on relations between the UK and North Korea of establishing diplomatic missions in the capitals of each country. [190331]

Mr. Rammell: The establishment of embassies in London and Pyongyang has provided an effective and regular channel of communication between our respective governments. This, together with my own visit to Pyongyang last month, has enabled us to make clear our views on issues of international concern, such as North Korea's nuclear programmes and human rights record. We will continue to encourage the North Koreans to engage fully on these issues.

23. Paddy Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with North Korea on nuclear policy. [190338]

Mr. Rammell: I visited North Korea from 11 to 14 September. North Korea's nuclear policy was one of the issues which I raised during my visit.

I made a written statement to the House on my discussions in North Korea on 16 September 2004, Official Report, columns 186–88WS.

Ross Cranston: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his assessment is of North Korea's nuclear weapons programme. [190326]

Mr. Rammell: The Government assesses that North Korea has sufficient fissile material for a small number of nuclear weapons, and the technical capability to produce them. North Korea has also confirmed that it has completed the reprocessing of some 8,000 spent fuel rods, something about which we, and the international community, are very concerned.

Afghanistan

18. Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what arrangements he has made to (a) monitor and (b) assess the presidential elections in Afghanistan. [190333]

Mr. Rammell: The UK provided four UK nationals to the OSCE Election Support Team, plus funding of £140,000. We contributed £50,000 to the "Free and Fair Elections Foundation of Afghanistan", which fielded some (1,700) local Afghan monitors; and £25,000 to the "Asia Network for Free Elections" to monitor voting by Afghan refugees in Iran. British embassy staff observed in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iran.

We shall assess the results with our international partners.

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on women's rights and dowry payments in Afghanistan. [189884]

Mr. Rammell: Women's rights have improved dramatically since the fall of the Taliban, with access to education, healthcare and employment opportunities that would have been unthinkable under the Taliban regime. Just under 2 million girls have returned to school and one-third of Afghanistan's 70,000 teachers are now women. Women's rights are protected by the new constitution, which also reserves a proportion of seats in Parliament for women candidates. Women have registered in large numbers to vote for the upcoming elections: over 40 per cent. of the 10.5 million Afghans registered.

Despite these improvements many challenges still remain. Women suffer disproportionately from violence in Afghan society. Women's ability to exercise their rights also remains heavily constrained in some areas, particularly rural areas in the south and south-east. The UK is committed to working with the Afghan Government and their international partners to improve women's ability to exercise their rights. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Department for International Development have agreed a comprehensive Gender Strategy for 2004–05, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Dowry payments are a traditional part of Afghan marriage ceremonies, as in many other countries.

St. Helena

19. Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to visit St. Helena to discuss its economy. [190334]

Mr. Rammell: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has no current plans to visit St. Helena.

However, Ministers take every opportunity to meet with councillors from St. Helena when they visit the UK, during which we discuss a whole range of issues. My most recent meeting with councillors was last month in the margins of the Overseas Territories Consultative Council.

Darfur

20. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his assessment is of the situation in Darfur. [190335]

Mr. Mullin: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy.

We remain very concerned about the situation in Darfur. Despite some progress on the humanitarian side, ceasefire violations by rebel and government forces continue. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister discussed these issues last week with the Sudanese President, who agreed to a five-point action plan. The Sudanese will be judged not by their words, but by their actions over the coming weeks.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his Answer of 14 September 2004, Official Report, columns 1551–52W, what evidence the Government would need in order to determine that the atrocities carried out in Darfur constituted genocide; and if he will set out the direct consequences of defining a situation as genocide. [189796]

Mr. Mullin: As called for in Security Council Resolution 1564, the Secretary-General has established an International Commission of Inquiry to determine whether or not acts of genocide have occurred and to identify the perpetrators. He has asked the Commission to report within three months. Article II of the 1948 Genocide Convention defines genocide as the "intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group". Under this convention, the State Parties undertake to prevent and to punish the crime of genocide.

Middle East

21. Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimate he has made of the number of Palestinians who have been separated from (a) their farmland and (b) their place of work by the Israel Wall impinging into Palestinian territory. [190336]

Mr. Rammell: We estimate that approximately 240,000 Palestinians (including 220,000 in east Jerusalem) live on the Israeli side of the barrier constructed so far, and so are potentially cut off from their places of work, schools and families. About 94,000 more may have been separated from their farmland.[1]

As a result of the 30 June Israeli High Court ruling, the Israeli Government is revising the route of the barrier.

[1] These figures are based on recent Palestinian Negotiations Affairs Department and OCHA (United Nations Office for the Co-ordination of Humanitarian Affairs) reports.

Kashmir

22. Mr. Goodman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Government of (a) India and (b) Pakistan on Kashmir. [190337]

Mr. Alexander: My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary discussed India-Pakistan relations with their Indian counterparts during Prime Minister Singh's visit to London on 20 September. The Foreign Secretary met his Pakistan counterpart on 23 September during the UN General Assembly. We conveyed to both Governments our warm support for the current dialogue process, and urged them to continue to press forward to resolve all their outstanding differences, including over Kashmir.

Brazil

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions his Department has engaged in with the Government of Brazil regarding computer hacking. [189883]

Mr. Rammell: We are in close contact with the Brazilian Government on a number of organised crime issues including hacking and other hi-tech crime. In mid-September, the head of the UK's National Hi-Tech Crime Unit (NHTCU), and representatives from the British embassy attended the first International Conference on Cyber Crime Investigations in Brasilia. We hope that the Brazilian Federal Police will also attend the NHTCU's E-crime Congress to be held in the UK in April 2005.

Butler Report

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his answer of 13 September 2004, Official Report, column 1450W, if he will specify the year of the dates given; which Government Ministers were informed; what communications there were between the Foreign Office and the Prime Minister's Office; and when these communications took place. [190073]

Mr. Straw: The year referred to was 2004. The Ministers referred to were my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and me. The communications between our respective offices took place in June 2004. Information relating to internal discussion and advice is exempt from disclosure under exemption 2 of Part 2 the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Chagos Islands

Jeremy Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to consult Chagos Islanders on compensation for loss of livelihood. [190332]

Mr. Rammell: As the hon. Member for Islington, North knows, the High Court judgment of 9 October 2003 established that the Government have no legal obligation to pay any further compensation beyond what has already been provided. This was confirmed by the Court of Appeal on 22 July 2004. Consequently, while I have made it clear that I am prepared to meet Chagossian representatives, I have no plans to consult them on compensation.

Global Warming

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations the Government are making to the United States Administration to encourage its engagement with international efforts to combat global warming. [190325]

Mr. Rammell: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Dr. Turner).

Hurricane Ivan

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the impact of Hurricane Ivan on (a) Grenada, (b) Jamaica and (c) Cuba giving (i) the estimated number of (A) fatalities and (B) serious injuries and (ii) the levels of homelessness in each case; and what help was forthcoming in each case. [189905]

Mr. Rammell: Sadly, Hurricane Ivan has had a devastating effect on Grenada. The latest figures we have for deaths and injuries are 39 dead and 353 treated for injuries. Royal Navy medical staff were on the ground at the general hospital on the morning after the hurricane. It is estimated that some 90 per cent. of the housing stock was damaged.

For UK assistance to Grenada I refer my hon. Friend to the statement my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn) made to the House on 14 September 2004, Official Report, columns 1125–27, which was updated on 16 September 2004, Official Report, columns 169–72WS. A further written statement, updating the House on UK assistance following Hurricanes Ivan and Jeanne was issued today.

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has appointed my noble Friend the Baroness Howells of St. David's as his personal envoy to Grenada. She travelled to Barbados and Grenada from 21 to 24 September with representatives of the Department for International Development (DFID) and the British High Commissioner to Barbados and the Eastern Caribbean to see the situation at first hand.

In Jamaica the impact was, fortunately, not as severe as first feared, although tragically 17 people have reportedly lost their lives. We do not have any details of serious injuries but the number of people directly and significantly affected by the hurricane is thought to be around 25,000 people. It is believed some 5,000 were made homeless. The Jamaica Red Cross estimates that approximately 25,000 people have suffered enough damage to their homes to require external assistance to start their own recovery. DFID have allocated £600,000 to the Jamaican humanitarian response.

The impact from Hurricane Ivan on Cuba was far less than originally feared as the eye of the storm missed the mainland. There were no reported fatalities, but according to the UN 8,000 people were left homeless. Reports are still being gathered from the affected areas, and once these are completed we will consider what support is needed.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports of looting and lawlessness were reported in (a) Grenada, (b) Jamaica and (c) Cuba in the aftermath of Hurricane Ivan. [189906]

Mr. Rammell: In the days following Hurricane Ivan there were reports of looting in and around the capital of Grenada, St. George's. Troops from other Caribbean countries were sent to Grenada to help re-establish control and enforce a curfew. They arrived the second day after the hurricane. The Government of Grenada says the situation is now generally calm.

As the storm approached Jamaica, the Prime Minister, P J Patterson declared a state of public emergency. This can last up to a maximum of 30 days unless Parliament extends it. The stated reason was prior knowledge of planned looting. Several people were apparently arrested. There were reports of looting in various inner city areas and two police officers were shot and wounded. The Jamaican Security forces were on duty throughout and kept the situation generally under control.

Fortunately the eye of the storm missed the Cuban mainland and there was far less damage than expected. There were no reports of looting or lawlessness.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the ability of the High Commission in Grenada to respond to the level of need in the aftermath of Hurricane Ivan for (a) British citizens, (b) Grenadian nationals and (c) others. [189907]

Mr. Rammell: At the time of the hurricane there was one UK-based member of staff in Grenada and two locally-engaged staff. Royal Navy personnel were on hand to assist as soon as the hurricane passed and we reinforced the office as soon as was possible with four staff from Bridgetown. The office opened as soon as it was possible for staff to reach it. Two staff were also sent from London to assist.

In the immediate aftermath of the hurricane there was no telephone service and many roads were blocked. High Commission staff moved from hotel to hotel to make contact with tour operators and British and EU tourists and helped make arrangements for them to leave the island. Staff took messages for relatives of a number of British, Grenadian and other foreign nationals in the UK and elsewhere.

Over the weekend following the hurricane we helped over 400 British, EU and Commonwealth nationals leave Grenada on a variety of unscheduled flights including one we chartered.

Our consular responsibility was to British nationals, including dual nationals and EU nationals in the first instance. Inquiring Grenadian nationals were given advice on travel and immigration regulations in the UK.

Western Sahara

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent reports he has received of remarks by the UN Secretary-General's former personal envoy to the Western Sahara on the policy of Morocco regarding a settlement in Western Sahara; and if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on progress towards a settlement. [190003]

Mr. Rammell: James Baker the former personal envoy to Western Sahara of the UN Secretary-General, gave an extensive interview regarding the Western Sahara on American television on 19 August. A transcript can be found on the internet at http://www.pbs.org/wnet/wideangle/shows/sahara/transcript.html. The Polisario have quoted from this interview in a memorandum circulated to United Nations member States.

The United Kingdom continues to seek a just, lasting and mutually acceptable solution to the Western Sahara dispute which provides the people of the Western Sahara with an opportunity to exercise their right to self-determination. We believe UN efforts to find a solution to the dispute should be maintained and we will continue to support those.

Iraq

Sir Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on border traffic between Turkey and Iraq. [189369]

Mr. Straw [holding answer of 11 October 2004]: There have been severe delays to traffic crossing the Habur gate between Turkey and Iraq. I discussed this with both Turkish and Iraqi governments when I visited last week and encouraged them to find a solution. Discussions are continuing, including consideration of a possible second border crossing point. Tailbacks on the Turkish side of the Habur crossing are 40–50km long. It can take two weeks for a truck to get through.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to the answer of 14 September 2004, Official Report, column 1548W, how the money is to be spent. [190232]

Mr. Rammell [holding answer of 11 October 2004] : The Department for International Development's (DFID) Political Participation Fund for Iraq; administered by the British Council is a £5 million programme over two years, designed to increase opportunities for political representation and participation by all Iraqi citizens, particularly women. Since early September. £145,000 has been allocated to provide support to Iraqi national women's organisations. This will help them to prepare for the elections by delivering civic education and information to women voters, working with potential candidates and monitoring women's participation in the political process. DFID and the British Council, responsible for managing the Fund, are looking at further opportunities to support women's participation in the political process, both before and after the forthcoming elections.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Ards and Down Area Plan

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the public inquiry into the Draft Ards and Down Area Plan will begin. [190175]

Angela Smith: The Planning Appeals Commission sets the date for the commencement of the Public Inquiry. A start date has not been set at present.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what efforts the Department of Environment has made to resolve the objections received in response to the publication of the Draft Ards and Down Area Plan; and how many of those objections were resolved by the Department. [190176]

Angela Smith: The Department of the Environment received 2369 objections to the draft Ards and Down Area Plan. A number of the objections received relate to multiple issues. Full consideration has been given to all objections and work is now nearing completion on the preparation of the Department's rebuttal statements.

While the Department may see merit in all or part of an issue raised in a number of the objections, it is not possible to resolve objections at this stage. All objections have been put on public display and can be subject to a counter objection up to the date of the public inquiry. The rebuttal statements, which set out the Department's view on each individual objection, will be presented at the public inquiry which provides the mechanism for the issues to be fully considered.

It is therefore not possible to confirm at this stage the number of objections that may be resolved.

Asbestosis

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will extend the scope of asbestos industrial injury benefit to include family members of asbestosis sufferers. [189678]

Mr. Spellar: The statutory provisions of the Industrial Injuries Scheme provide benefit to employed earners due to an illness or injury due to their occupation. There are no plans to extend the scope of the Industrial Injuries Scheme to family members of asbestosis sufferers.

Business Education Partnership

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what costs were incurred by each of the three departments involved in establishing the Northern Ireland Business Education Partnership. [189674]

Mr. Gardiner: NIBEP was established by the Training and Employment Agency (now the Department for Employment and Learning) and the Department of Education jointly in 1995, in the form of an unincorporated association within Business in the Community. In June 2000 it was incorporated as a company limited by guarantee and moved to its own premises. Any costs incurred in respect of this move were offset by moneys transferred from Business in the Community to NIBEP at the point where responsibility transferred from one to the other. The staffing of NIBEP when it was established in 1995 consisted of one secondment from the business sector (ie at no cost to the public purse). The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Industry has incurred no costs in respect of NIBEP at any time.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the cost of running the Northern Ireland Business Education Partnership was in each of the last three years; and what the estimated cost of closing it is. [189675]

Mr. Gardiner: The information requested is as follows:

	Running costs (£)
2001–02	284,223
2002–03	244,999
2003–04	202,516
2004–05[1]	147,899

[1] 1 April 2004 to 31 August 2004 only.

Note:

These do not include direct programme expenditure.

Estimated cost of closing NIBEP

£18,000 + expenses (but will be subject to issues arising during the course of the liquidation).

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which (a) Department and (b) organisation will be responsible for carrying out the work of the Northern Ireland Business Education Partnership. [189700]

Mr. Gardiner: Future arrangements for business-education activities in support of education for employability in the curriculum are under consideration jointly by the Departments of Education, Employment and Learning and Enterprise, Trade and Investment.

As an interim measure the major bodies providing business-education activities and programmes that are currently funded through NIBEP will continue to be funded for the remainder of the 2004–05 financial year until substantive arrangements are put in place for the future. This is to be administered by the three Departments with Department of Education in the lead.

Cancer Patients

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what resources are provided to support cancer patients making the choice to die at home. [189966]

Angela Smith: Patients with a cancer diagnosis making the choice to die at home are facilitated through primary, community and acute services. Specific services developed within the boards in the last number of years include provision of palliative care drug boxes for out of hours use by GPs and other primary health care professionals, developing the district nursing twilight services, provision of night nursing services in partnership with Marie Curie Cancer Care and complementary and counselling therapies.

A Regional Cancer Services Framework is currently being developed to make recommendations for the future delivery of cancer services in Northern Ireland over the next 20 years. As part of its work, the framework will be considering the future development of palliative care services in the home. The framework is expected to be completed by 31 December 2004.

Castlereagh (Industrial Development)

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment has had with Castlereagh College on training requirements for future industrial development in the Castlereagh area. [189659]

Mr. Gardiner: Neither the Department of Enterprise Trade and Investment, nor Invest NI, have had any direct discussions with Castlereagh College. Invest NI's Accelerating Entrepreneurship Strategy (AES) seeks to actively embed entrepreneurship throughout Northern Ireland's education and training systems. Aspects of AES are undertaken in close liaison with the Association of Northern Ireland Colleges, which represents the sixteen Further Education colleges in NI, including Castlereagh.

Through its Business Improvement Services function, Invest NI also provides specific company based training and development programmes linked directly to the needs of local companies. These programmes can be delivered using internal or external trainers as appropriate, with each client company being responsible for the selection of any external providers. Such training is entirely tailored to the needs of the company thus offering a specific focus on the local economic development needs of the area in which it is based.

Churches (Signing)

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the Department of Regional Development's review of its policy on signing of churches will be carried out; and if he will make a statement. [189661]

Mr. Spellar: The Chief Executive of Roads Service (Dr. Malcolm McKibbin) has been asked to write to the hon. Lady in response to this Question.

Letter from Dr. Malcolm McKibbin to Mrs. Iris Robinson, dated 22 September 2004:

You recently asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland a Parliamentary Question about the review of direction signing to churches. I have been asked to reply as the issue raised falls within my responsibility as Chief Executive of Roads Service.

I can confirm that the work on the policy review of the signing of churches and other privately operated premises is on-going and it is expected to be complete by the end of November 2004.

Civil Servants (Private Sector Work)

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many divisional planning managers within the Department of the Environment have been granted permission to become private sector planning consultants in the last five years. [189881]

Angela Smith: No current Divisional Planning Manager has been given permission to become a private sector planning consultant.

Civil Service Industrial Action

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many staff days have been lost as a result of industrial action in each Department, agency and non-departmental public body in Northern Ireland since the start of the current industrial action by civil servants. [188248]

Mr. Pearson: Since the start of the current industrial action by civil servants up to 3 September 2004, 54,737 staff days have been lost in Departments, agencies and non-departmental public bodies in Northern Ireland. A breakdown of the figures for each Department, agency and non-departmental public body is as follows.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the action that he has taken since the beginning of the parliamentary summer recess to bring an end to industrial action by civil servants in Northern Ireland. [188249]

Mr. Pearson: Intensive negotiations took place in July between officials from the Department of Finance and Personnel and trade union representatives. At these meetings officials emphasised that the 3.67 per cent. pay deal for 2003 had now been paid and was final, but that they were willing to explore all reasonable means of resolving the dispute. The trade union also met with the Secretary of State and myself on 23 July to discuss the situation. On 3 August management tabled two offers for 2004 to the trade union a 12-month offer worth 3.49 per cent. and a 16-month offer worth 4.65 per cent. Both offers were quickly rejected and further negotiations took place on 4, 11 and 13 August. As a result of these further negotiations, management restructured the 4.65 per cent. 16-month offer and this was formally put to trade union side on 16 August. The revised offer included an increase in rates of pay of 2 per cent. plus a non-consolidated payment of £150 for all staff.

On 13 September the trade union accepted the 16-month pay offer worth 4.65 per cent. and agreed to suspend the current industrial action. It is hoped that public services can return to normal as a matter of urgency.

Staff in the Northern Ireland Office are subject to separate pay negotiations involving NIPSA in respect of Northern Ireland civil servants and PCS and PDA in respect of home civil servants. All three unions remain in dispute in relation to the 2003 pay award, although only NIPSA has taken industrial action. Formal negotiations in relation to 2004 pay are ongoing.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the impact of industrial action by civil servants in Northern Ireland on (a) members of the public and (b) businesses. [188250]

Mr. Pearson: The industrial action by civil servants, which commenced on 11 December 2003, ended on 13 September. Selective strike action taken by some members of the Northern Ireland Public Service Alliance, did impact on services to members of the public and business. While contingency plans were in place to minimise disruption, strike action by staff in the Driver and Vehicle Testing Agency resulted in a significant backlog of both vehicle and driver tests. There were also delays in payment of agricultural grants and subsidies, delays in processing planning applications and postponement of Industrial and Fair Employment Tribunal hearings. Precise information on the impact of industrial action on businesses is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Deaths (Drink and Drugs)

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many deaths there were in Northern Ireland in 2003 from (a) suicide, (b) drowning, (c) house fires, (d) other domestic accidents, (e) road traffic accidents, (f) murder and (g) manslaughter; and what percentage were (i) alcohol and (ii) drug-related in each case. [188531]

Mr. Pearson: The following tables give the total number of deaths/offences in Northern Ireland in 2003 due to suicide and undetermined injury, drowning, domestic accidents (other than fires in a dwelling or drowning), fires in a dwelling, road traffic collisions, murder and manslaughter. Where possible, the percentage of these deaths/offences, which were alcohol and drug-related is provided.

Table 1: Number of registered deaths in Northern Ireland in 2003 from suicide and undetermined injury, drowning and domestic accidents (other than fires in a dwelling or drowning)

2003[1] deaths	Number of deaths	Alcohol related percentage	Drug-related percentage
Suicide and undetermined injury[2]	144	0	16
Suicide	132	0	13
Undetermined injury	12	0	50
Drowning[3]	25	n/a	n/a
Domestic accidents (other than fires in a dwelling or drowning)[3]	70	n/a	n/a

[1] Data for 2003 are provisional and are derived from the civil death registration system.

[2] In the UK, in considering suicide events it is conventional to include cases where the cause of death is classified as both "suicide and self-inflicted injury" and "undetermined injury". Figures for the percentage of suicides and undetermined injury that are drug-related may include prescription and/or illegal drugs and includes deaths where a combination of alcohol and prescription/illegal drugs were involved, but not intentional or undetermined alcohol poisoning alone.

[3] For these causes of death, there is no information collected on a death certificate about whether the death was alcohol or drug related.

Note:

N/a data not available.

Table 2: Number of deaths in Northern Ireland in 2003 from fires in a dwelling

2003 Deaths[1]	Number of deaths	Alcohol related	Drug-related
Fires in a dwelling	11	n/a	n/a

[1] Data supplied by the Fire Service of Northern Ireland. No information is available on whether the death due to a fire in a dwelling was alcohol or drug related.

Note:

N/a data not available.

Table 3: Number of deaths/offences in Northern Ireland in 2003 from road traffic collisions, murder and manslaughter

2003 Deaths/offences[1]	Number	Alcohol or drug related percentage
Road traffic collision deaths	150	30
Murder offences	35	n/a
Manslaughter offences	6	n/a

[1] Data supplied by the Police Service of Northern Ireland. The breakdown of deaths due to a road traffic collision which are alcohol or drug-related, includes deaths which are alcohol and/or prescription/illegal drug related. No information is available on whether the recorded murder or manslaughter offence was alcohol or drug related.

Note:

N/a data not available.

Demographics

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the population was of (a) Moira, (b) Aghalee, (c) Magheralin, (d) Dollingstown, (e) Donaghacloney, (f) Waringstown, (g) Maghaberry and (h) Aghagallon in (i) 1981, (ii) 1991 and (iii) 2001. [187996]

Mr. Pearson: Commonly agreed definitions of the geographical areas covered by settlements are not available over the period in question. In the 1981 and 1991 censuses, the settlement areas were approximated at those times by Irish Grid Squares while the 2001 census used settlement development limits as defined by the Department of the Environment. Given the different boundaries used over time, and changes in census methodology, changes in the population figures provided as follows cannot be wholly attributed to population growth or decline.

	1981	1991	2001
Moira	1,453	2,772	3,669
Aghalee	735	480	111
Magheralin	911	1,075	1,134
Dollingstown	604	877	1,830

Waringstown	1,167	1,831	2,523
Maghaberry	n/a	1,009	1,692
Aghagallon	n/a	655	819

Note:

n/a refers to figures for which area boundaries are unavailable.

Euro/European Constitution

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much money has been spent in Northern Ireland since 2001 on preparations for (a) the introduction of the euro and (b) a referendum on the European Constitution. [190103]

Mr. Pearson: On (a) I refer the hon. Member to the response given by my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Ms Kelly), on 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 142W. On (b), since 2001 no money has been spent on the referendum on the European Constitution in Northern Ireland.

GM Crops

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether it is Government policy not to allow the growing of GM crops in Northern Ireland. [190022]

Angela Smith: It is not the Government's policy to prevent the growing of GM crops in Northern Ireland. On 9 March 2004 the Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs made a statement in the House setting out the Government's policy on GM issues [Column 1381]. Similar statements were made on the same day in the Welsh Assembly and the Scottish Parliament. In addition, I issued a press release on 12 March 2004 setting out the position in respect of Northern Ireland. A copy has been placed in the Library.

The essence of our policy is that GM crops will be considered on a case-by-case basis, and consumers will have choice through mandatory labelling of GM products. The primary concern will continue to be to safeguard human health and the environment. The Government will ensure that GM products are safe and provide consumer choice through labelling, but ultimately it will be for farmers and consumers to decide whether they want GM crops and food.

Hearing Aids

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the average waiting time is for people in Northern Ireland to be supplied with a hearing aid in Northern Ireland hospitals. [190065]

Angela Smith: Information on average waiting times for supply of hearing aids is not collected. However, provisional information for the quarter ending June 2004 indicates that the median waiting time (the middle value of all waiting times) from the hospital receiving a referral to the supply of a digital hearing aid is between three and six months.

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the waiting list is for the supply of hearing aids to patients in each Northern Ireland hospital. [190066]

Angela Smith: This information requested is not available.

Heart Disease

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will replicate the framework for heart diseases in England in Northern Ireland. [190311]

Angela Smith: While the health service for Northern Ireland is not included in the National Service Framework for Coronary Heart Disease, the main features were taken fully into account as best practice guidelines in the Review of Cardiology Services in 1999 and a subsequent Review of Cardiac Surgery Services in 2000. The recommendations from these reviews are currently being implemented through a Joint Action Plan, but the ability to fully implement all aspects of the service framework would be dependent on additional resources.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to introduce measures of outcomes in the treatment of heart disease. [190312]

Angela Smith: Health and Social Services Trusts already have measures in place to monitor the outcomes of cardiology and cardiac surgery treatments on an ongoing basis. These include the use of clinical audit and contributions to national databases. For example, the Royal Victoria Hospital contributes to the national database for cardiac surgery outcomes, as well as participating in European and international trials aimed at improving treatments of heart disease.

Home Care

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what measures are in place to facilitate joint working between service providers of home care in Northern Ireland. [189967]

Angela Smith: The promotion of a flourishing independent sector in social care provision is a key objective of the 'People First' policy. Health and Personal Social Services bodies engage with a wide range of private and voluntary sector agencies in the planning and delivery of domiciliary care. Arrangements also exist for the joint consideration of important issues such as recruitment and training.

Housing (Fraud)

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases were recorded of people on housing benefits attempting to defraud the Housing Executive when purchasing houses from it in each of the last three years, with particular reference to (a) organised criminal gangs and (b) paramilitary organisations. [189676]

Mr. Spellar: The information requested is not readily available. However the Housing Executive estimates that over the last three years there were around 73 cases of suspected housing benefit fraud where a house sale was also involved.

The vast majority of these would have been referred to the Benefit Investigation Unit of the Social Security Agency in the 2003–04 financial year for investigation. Of the original 73 cases referred, in one case a substantial overpayment is being raised, in 19 cases investigations are continuing and so evidence of fraudulent activity was found in the remainder.

All allegations of fraud are taken seriously and investigated thoroughly so that those involved can be prosecuted where there is evidence of fraud. The proposed revisions to the House Sales Scheme, which will apply to applications made from 18 May 2004 contain a range of measures aimed at retaining houses in the social rented sector and will strengthen existing procedures to help reduce the potential for fraud.

Housing Executive

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list schemes the Housing Executive has approved for the next 12 months which grant funding to housing associations for new build locations, broken down by amount of funding involved; and if he will make a statement on applications from housing associations for new build locations which have been refused because the Housing Executive disagreed with the needs assessment carried out by a housing association. [189677]

Mr. Spellar: The role of the Housing Executive is to identify housing need and to prioritise bids from housing associations to meet that need. The Department then agrees the programme and allocates funding accordingly.

The following table lists all schemes that have Housing Executive support to start on site in the 2004–05 financial year. It is not possible to provide information in respect of the next 12 months as requested, as schemes for the next financial year have not been finalised.

The Department does not maintain a record of applications where there has been a dispute between housing associations and the Housing Executive on needs assessment. In cases where a housing association feels that need has not been fully identified, the Housing Executive welcomes evidence to support the contrary view and is content to enter into discussions to resolve and make adjustments if required.

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many homes were sold to tenants by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive in each of the five years to the end of 2003. [189733]

Mr. Spellar: For each of the last five financial years up to 31 March 2003 the figures requested are as follows:

	Number sold to sitting tenants
2003–04	5,583
2002–03	5,991
2001–02	4,985
2000–01	5,509
1999–2000	4,449

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many homes were in the ownership of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive at the end of 2003. [189734]

Mr. Spellar: At the end of the financial year 1 April 2003 to 31 March 2004 the number was 102,850.

Industrial Tribunals

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the average waiting time to hear an industrial tribunal case in Northern Ireland was in the last year for which figures are available. [189696]

Mr. Gardiner: In 2003 the average time from application to hearing for Industrial Tribunal discriminatory complaints was two years six months and for non-discriminatory complaints five months.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many industrial tribunal cases in Northern Ireland are waiting to be heard; and what action he is taking to reduce waiting times. [189697]

Mr. Gardiner: On 23 August 2004 there were 12,967 cases awaiting determination by the Industrial Tribunals. Almost 2,000 of these were discrimination cases and the remainder were non-discrimination cases. Some 6,300 cases relate to a common complaint against one respondent under working time regulations and a further 1,936 cases relate to 10 large multiple applications. A case may involve more than one complaint.

A series of measures has already been taken to improve the operation of the tribunals and reduce waiting times, including:

appointment of three additional full-time Chairmen;

updating the Tribunal rules of procedure;

provision of additional administrative staff;

provision of additional Tribunal accommodation, and;

introduction of a new IT system.

Further improvements will include:

the imminent appointment of additional part-time chairmen;

enhancements to the Tribunals IT system;

testing the use of digital audio recording systems to speed up lengthy cases; improved case management; and promoting alternative methods of resolving workplace disputes.

In addition, new regulations due to come into effect in April 2005 will introduce statutory minimum dispute resolution procedures in every workplace in Northern Ireland. The outcome of this legislation should be a reduction in the number of applications being made to the Tribunals, which in time should reduce waiting times overall.

Inward Investment

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans Invest Northern Ireland has to ensure that more potential inward investors have opportunities to visit the East Londonderry constituency in 2005. [189610]

Mr. Gardiner: In the context of a highly competitive marketplace for mobile international investment, the priority is to maximise investment for the Northern Ireland economy as a whole.

Internationally, Invest Northern Ireland will continue to focus its sales and marketing efforts on aggressively promoting Northern Ireland as an attractive and viable location for new inward investment opportunities. Invest Northern Ireland has a target of securing 150 inward visits by potential investors during the financial year 2004–05. While efforts are made to take visitors to as many potential locations as possible in Northern Ireland, each visit programme is dictated by investor requirements. Invest Northern Ireland's local offices have been working with local stakeholders to ensure that up to date and detailed information on sub-regions is available to potential investors when required.

Lagan Doc Service

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the recording of telephone conversations between the general public and staff at Lagan Doc Service commenced at Down, Lisburn Trust as a matter of course; and if he will make a statement. [190152]

Angela Smith: Lagan Doc Out-of-Hours Service has been recording all incoming calls from the public from 6 August 2004. The primary reason for doing so is to help improve the quality of service provided and additionally for staff training and security purposes. Callers are advised at the outset, by a pre-recorded message, that the call is being recorded and of the reasons for doing so.

Londonderry Railway Station

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much has been spent on (a) maintenance and (b) improvements to the rail station in Londonderry in each of the past five years. [189604]

Mr. Spellar: The following figures detail how much has been spent on maintenance to the rail station in Londonderry in each of the past five years. There were no capital costs for improvements or additions.

Maintenance

1999–2000	30,445
2000–01	31,387
2001–02	33,039
2002–03	34,416
2003–04	41,930

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people were employed in manufacturing in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years; and how many people he estimates will be employed in manufacturing in each of the next five years. [153833]

Mr. Gardiner: The NI labour market is performing well; the latest employee jobs figure of 683,050 is the highest figure on record. However, over the last 30 years a trend of declining manufacturing employment has been a feature of advanced economies including NI. As illustrated in the following table, over the last five years the number of manufacturing employee jobs in NI decreased by over 15 per cent. (the comparable figure for the UK is 17 per cent.).

Employee jobs in manufacturing (seasonally adjusted)

Year (June)	Manufacturing employee jobs in NI
1999	105,430
2000	103,830
2001	101,930
2002 (R)	97,510
2003 (R)	92,840
2004 (P)	89,080

The Department does not provide forecasts of labour market trends. However, DETI is aware of the challenges facing manufacturing and has recently commissioned research which will inform the development of NI policy for this important sector.

Mental Health

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the cost to public funds in the Province was in each of the last five years of (a) care provision, (b) absence from work, (c) legal actions against employers and (d) premature deaths, in relation to mental health. [188543]

Angela Smith: Details of total HSS Trust expenditure on the Mental Health Programme of Care in Northern Ireland for each of the last five years available are listed in the following table:

Year ended March	Total Expenditure (£ millions)
1999	114.8
2000	124.0
2001	133.2
2002	139.3
2003	150.8

The information required to answer parts (b), (c) and (d) is not available.

Ministers

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many days each Northern Ireland Minister was on duty in the Province in each of the last six months. [188734]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The number of days that each Northern Ireland Office Minister was on duty in Northern Ireland in each of the last six months was as follows:

	March	April	May	June	July	August
Secretary of State	10	16	13	13	10	8
John Spellar	10	5	8	10	5	1

Post Offices (Deprived Areas)

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made in implementing the Fund to Develop Post Offices in Deprived Urban Areas. [190380]

Mr. Spellar: This Deprived Urban Post Office Scheme opened for applications in April of this year. The first application was received in May from a Belfast post master and the second application was received in June from a Lurgan post master. Both of these applications are at an advanced stage of processing. Two further applications to the scheme were received in September from post masters in Craigavon and Newry.

Officials from the Department for Social Development have met with representatives from Post Office Ltd. regarding the scheme. At these discussions the post office confirmed that further applications will be submitted to the Department in the near future.

Public Services

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will estimate the cost of the duplication of public services in Northern Ireland provided separately for Catholics and Protestants. [190026]

Mr. Spellar: The Government continues to work to provide services that are focused on delivering the outcomes that all of the citizens in Northern Ireland need and expect.

The Government acknowledges that Northern Ireland remains deeply divided, despite earnest progress, particularly at local level, to build trust and confidence within and between communities. It recognises that division, and the tensions and conflict that it causes, almost certainly may have reduced the cost effectiveness of public service provision.

The causes of division are complex and the understanding of these causes and their associated costs will be an important dimension of the work that will flow from the new strategic framework and policy on good relations that we propose to bring forward later this year.

PWS Ireland

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much money has been paid to the company PWS Ireland in each year since January 2001 in return for work completed in fulfilling government tender work in relation to the provision of road traffic signs and associated equipment, including the hire of equipment; how much money has been paid in total in each year since January 2001 in return for the completion of government tenders in relation to the provision of road traffic signs and associated equipment; and if he will make a statement. [190132]

Mr. Spellar: The Chief Executive of Roads Service (Dr. Malcolm McKibbin) has been asked to write to the hon. Lady in response to this question.

Letter from Dr. Malcolm McKibbin to Mrs. Iris Robinson, dated 8 October 2004:

You recently asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland a Parliamentary Question about how much money has been paid to the company PWS Ireland in each year since January 2001, and how much money has been paid in total each year since January 2001 for the completion of government tenders for the provision of road traffic signs and associated equipment. I have been asked to reply as the issue raised falls within my responsibility as Chief Executive of Roads Service.

Under normal circumstances, in accordance with part 2, para. 13 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information (Third Party's Commercial Confidences), it would be inappropriate to provide the information, which you have requested. I have however confirmed with PWS Ireland that they are content that the information, which you have requested, can be provided in this instance and I am therefore able to make this available to you.

The sums paid to PWS Ireland in each year since January 2001, and sums paid in total each year since January 2001 for the completion of government tenders for the provision of road traffic signs and associated equipment, are shown in the following table.

	Paid to PWS Ireland	Total sums paid
2001	649,893	793,675
2002	610,253	834,628
2003	440,129	857,765
2004	499,039	727,522

Renewable Energy Targets

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress is being made in reaching the renewable energy targets set for Northern Ireland over the next five years. [189605]

Mr. Gardiner: Northern Ireland's single renewable energy target is that, by 2012, 12 per cent. of electricity supplied to Northern Ireland consumers will come from indigenous renewable generation. Annual targets have not been set.

An estimate of the electricity supplied in Northern Ireland, originating from renewable energy sources during 2004–05, together with actual levels supplied for the past three years, is shown in the following table:

	Total renewables (excluding imports) GWh	Total electricity supply GWh	Percentage renewables (excluding imports) percentage
2001–02	128	8,317	1.5
2002–03	136	8,551	1.6
2003–04	238	8,671	2.7
2004–05 (est)	305	8,800	3.5

Residential Care (Teenagers)

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many teenagers who require some form of specialist residential care and treatment are in unsuitable accommodation; and what steps the health and social service boards are taking to provide suitable residential provision for such children. [188468]

Angela Smith: The four Heath and Social Services Boards indicate that there are 28 young people requiring some form of specialist residential care and treatment who are currently in residential accommodation not designed to meet their needs. Despite this, the Boards report that all of the young people involved are receiving a high standard of care.

The four Health and Social Services Boards are represented on the Children Matter Task Force, and there is continuing progress in the development of a range of residential care options for looked after children. This includes the development of a regional facility for children with social, emotional and psychological needs, and the expansion of the range of facilities capable of catering for children and young people with learning disabilities. There are also plans to redevelop existing Intensive Support Units, some of which will focus on addiction/substance misuse and behavioural problems.

Royal Hospital Trust

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects the Royal Hospital Trust to achieve the target of cardiac surgical operations set in 1992. [190313]

Angela Smith: A target level of 1,100 procedures per annum was set in 1992, and this was exceeded in 1994–95 when 1,128 procedures were carried out at the Royal Group of Hospitals. Since then, new therapies and interventions have been introduced that have reduced the overall demand for cardiac surgery and the case mix of patients requiring these has intensified. As a result, the Royal assesses current demand for cardiac surgery at around 900 cases per annum.

The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, in conjunction with Boards and Trusts, is presently examining the cardiology and cardiac surgery service with a view to further development. This will include the reconsideration of demand and capacity issues. The waiting list for cardiac surgery at the Royal was reduced by 50 per cent. in 2003–04.

Salt Boxes

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what criteria determine whether salt boxes are provided on streets and roads in Northern Ireland; [189902]

(2) how many salt boxes have been provided for the use of residents in (a) North Belfast and (b) Northern Ireland in each year since 2001; [189903]

(3) what the cost of the provision of salt boxes on streets and roads in Northern Ireland has been in each year since 2001; [189904]

(4) if he will provide a salt box for the use of residents in the Northwood Drive area of North Belfast. [190064]

Mr. Spellar: The Chief Executive of Roads Service (Dr. Malcolm McKibbin) has been asked to write to the hon. Gentleman in response to these questions.

Letter from Dr. Malcolm McKibbin to Mr. Nigel Dodds, dated 23 September 2004:

You recently asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland four Parliamentary Questions in relation salt box provision and costs in Northern Ireland. I have been asked to reply as the issues raised fall within my responsibility as Chief Executive of Roads Service.

You asked what criteria is used to determine whether a salt box should be provided. Roads Service receives many requests for the provision of salt boxes, and the demand outstrips our capacity to provide them all and replenish them, particularly in times of snow when boxes need frequent refilling.

Accordingly, salt boxes may be provided on public roads which are not included in the salting schedule, in accordance with the following procedure:

Sites qualify for detailed consideration if the gradient exceeds 5 per cent. and there is no reasonable alternative salted route;

Sites meeting that criterion are considered in more detail using a points system which takes account of factors such as, road gradient, road geometry, residential and commercial usage and community facilities (schools, hospitals, etc);

A salt box is provided if a site exceeds a certain points threshold.

You also asked how many salt boxes had been provided for the use of residents in North Belfast and Northern Ireland since 2001. While Roads Service does not maintain details of the number of salt boxes provided on a parliamentary constituency basis, the table below details the approximate number and estimated costs of providing and maintaining salt boxes across Northern Ireland's streets and roads in financial years 2001–02 to 2003–04. Generally salt boxes are collected at the end of the winter season, checked for serviceability, returned to site, and refilled before the next winter season.

Salt boxes provided in each of the last three years

	Number of boxes	Cost
2001–02	2,820	[1]137,689
2002–03	2,810	[1]141,153
2003–04	2,917	[1]148,420

[1] Costs include initial purchase/replacement costs attributable to these years, and the labour, plant and material cost of refilling the boxes.

With regard to provision of a salt box for the use of residents in the Northwood Drive area, there is little I can add to the recent responses you have received from Mr. Joe Drew, Eastern Divisional Roads Manager and myself on this matter.

In my letter of 21 July 2004, I explained again the above criteria used to determine whether salt boxes can be provided and, that following an assessment it has been concluded that Northwood Drive does not meet the minimum threshold for the provision of a salt box.

I have reviewed all previous correspondence on this issue, and have concluded that officials have conducted the assessment of the need for a salt box thoroughly, correctly, and in accordance with established policy, and I regret that we cannot provide a salt box at Northwood Drive.

I trust you will appreciate that there are many roads in Northern Ireland where local residents have similar concerns and, given the many other demands on our finite resources, many of them safety related, it is simply not possible for us to accede to all requests.

School Transport

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made in implementing the recommendation of the Northern Ireland Assembly regarding (a) seats and (b) seatbelts for all school children travelling to and from school in buses. [189611]

Mr. Gardiner: In 2003 the Department of the Environment commissioned transportation consultants to carry out an initial cost benefit assessment and draw up Terms of Reference for a full Regulatory Impact Assessment (RIA) of the Environment Committee's seating and seatbelt recommendations.

This research confirmed that these recommendations have very large capital and operating cost implications set against a small safety benefit. The consultants advised that, in order to complete a robust RIA, more data on travel demand, bus operations and school pupil casualty rates were needed. The Department is currently collating and collecting this information.

The Department of Education has no plans to amend the existing arrangements until the results of the RIA are known. All new Education and Library Board buses have seat belts fitted as standard. It will, however, take some time to replace the existing fleet which consists of almost 700 buses at present. Board buses are maintained to a higher standard than is required under current legislation.

School Travel Plan Pilot

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment the Government have made of the operation of the School Travel Plan Pilot; and what plans there are to extend its scope. [189671]

Mr. Spellar: The Chief Executive of Roads Service (Dr. Malcolm McKibbin) has been asked to write to the hon. Gentleman in response to this question.

Letter from Dr. Malcolm McKibbin to Mr. Roy Beggs, dated 27 September 2004:

You recently asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland a Parliamentary Question about what assessment the Government has made of the operation of the School Travel Plan Pilot; and what plans there are to extend its scope. I have been asked to reply as this issue falls within my responsibility as Chief Executive of Roads Service.

You will be aware that, as proposed by the Regional Transportation Strategy 2002–12, Roads Service has been working to address the issue of the 'school run', given its impact on morning traffic congestion, through the Travelwise "Safer Routes to Schools" initiative. The overall aim of this initiative is to encourage more children to walk, cycle and use public transport for their journey to school.

The Department of Education, the Department of the Environment Road Safety Team and other agencies are working alongside Roads Service in this project.

The following six schools are currently participating in the initiative:

St. Joseph's College, Belfast;

Oakwood Integrated Primary School, Dunmurry;

Wallace High School, Lisburn;

St. Anthony's Primary School, Craigavon;

Parkhall College, Antrim; and

St. Brigid's College, Londonderry

This is the first time a schools initiative to promote sustainable modes of transport has been undertaken in Northern Ireland. Measures at the six schools are mainly exploratory and at different stages of development. The overall aim is to assist each school in developing a travel plan, which sets out a package of measures for reducing the number of car trips made to school. Where appropriate, Roads Service will subsequently introduce improvements to the roadway, such as installing pedestrian facilities and traffic calming measures, to facilitate children who may want to walk, cycle or use public transport. Additionally, other measures such as cycle shelters and lockers are provided by the Department of Education inside the schools premises.

To get the school travel initiative started, Roads Service and its partners have spent nearly £85,000 over the last three years to investigate existing infrastructure and facilities at the schools, examine accident data, undertake surveys to establish baseline school travel information, and pay for the training of a Travel Plan Co-ordinator who was appointed to champion the initiative in the schools. No specific funding has been allocated as yet for the further development of travel plans, as resources are being concentrated for the time being on the pilot group of six schools. However, it is intended, as part of the next stage of the initiative, to develop a practical support package that encourages other schools to engage in the travel plan process.

The improvements to the infrastructure and facilities at each of the pilot schools will be completed early in 2005. While we will undertake a preliminary assessment of how successful these measures have been during the latter part of 2005, initial work including installation of cycle shelters at the schools has had very positive results and generated an increase in cycling among pupils. It is anticipated that the planned infrastructure work to the road network adjacent to the schools should have equal effect in facilitating and encouraging more children to use sustainable modes of transport.

Self-employment

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many self-employed people there were in Northern Ireland by the (a) end of 1998 and (b) end of 2003. [189609]

Mr. Gardiner: The Labour Force Survey (LFS) estimates that there were 95,000 self-employed people in Northern Ireland at winter 1998–99 and 111,000 self-employed people at winter 2003–04.

Sickness Absence

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment has been made of alternative methods for verifying absence from work through sickness. [188527]

Mr. Spellar: Following UK-wide consultation, as announced in "Pathways to work: Helping people into employment: the Government's response and action plan" [CM 5830], the Government have undertaken research to explore the potential for extending statutory certification to nonmedical health care professionals.

Sports Facilities

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what provision is being made to increase sports facilities in Northern Ireland prior to 2012. [189747]

Angela Smith: The Sports Council for Northern Ireland is presently planning a number of schemes which will include provision to increase sports facilities where required in advance of 2012. These include a new Sports Grounds Development Programme, Soccer Strategy programme and community based and performance focused Lottery capital programmes. The Sports Council is also currently developing a sports facilities strategy to help determine levels of sports facilities likely to be needed in Northern Ireland in the future, including prior to 2012. In addition to this, I am presently giving consideration to the possibility of a multi-sports stadium for Northern Ireland. The Department of Social Development (DSD), through its Regional Development Offices, and with assistance from the EU Peace 2 Programme, is contributing to and providing funding for the development of a wide range of multi-sports facilities in Northern Ireland. Moreover, in implementing the Neighbourhood Renewal Strategy over the next 7–10 years, DSD will continue to support regeneration proposals that incorporate sport as part of the comprehensive regeneration of disadvantaged areas.

Teachers (Sick Leave)

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland pursuant to his answer of 20 May, Official Report, column 1216W, on teachers' sick leave, when he intends to write to the hon. Member for East Antrim. [189695]

Mr. Gardiner: I wrote to the hon. Member for East Antrim on 1 October indicating that the number of teachers who took sick leave of 20 days or more during each of the last five academic years is as follows:

	Number of teachers with 20 or more days sick leave
1999–2000	1573
2000–2001	1765
2001–2002	1765
2002–2003	1809
2003–2004	1359

I have arranged for a copy of the letter to be placed in the Library.

TK-ECC Site

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps are being taken by the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to encourage maximum use of the former TK-ECC site in Dundonald, following its recent sale. [189660]

Mr. Gardiner: As the factory and its associated site are privately owned, Invest NI has no direct role in encouraging its use to be maximised.

However, Invest NI stands ready, if requested, to work with the owners and their agents to market the property in line with the existing employment/industrial use for which it is currently zoned.

Tunes Plateau Windfarm

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the latest position on the proposed offshore windfarm at Tunes Plateau. [189766]

Mr. Gardiner: The development consortium continues to undertake feasibility studies within the area which could potentially accommodate a wind farm. It has not as yet made an application for the development of a wind farm at Tunes Plateau. Should such an application be received it will be subject to full public consultation.

Universities

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what arrangements are in place to monitor the financial position of Northern Ireland's universities. [189672]

Mr. Gardiner: The Department for Employment and Learning engages the services of the Higher Education Funding Council for England (HEFCE) to monitor the financial position of the two Northern Ireland universities through the examination of various annual financial returns. HEFCE is a non-departmental public body of the Department for Education and Skills. In addition, HEFCE assesses annual reports from each university's Audit Committee, internal auditors and external auditors, as well as carrying out periodic review visits to Queen's University and the University of Ulster. The books and records of the universities are also audited and certified annually by the universities' external auditors. These are also open to inspection by the Department's internal auditors, HEFCE's Audit Service and the Northern Ireland Audit Office.

TREASURY

Employment

Tom Cox: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) part-time and (b) full-time workers are in employment in the Greater London area. [190260]

Mr. Timms: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician, who has been asked to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 12 October 2004:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your Parliamentary Question about employment in the Greater London area. (190260)

There were 2,836,000 people in full-time employment and 736,000 in part-time employment with usual residence in the Greater London area in the three month period ending May 2004, the latest date for which information is available. These estimates are not seasonally adjusted.

As with any sample survey, estimates from the Labour Force Survey (LFS) are subject to sampling variability.

Anne Picking: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many jobs have been created in East Lothian constituency since 1997. [190145]

Mr. Timms: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician, who has been asked to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Ms Anne Picking, dated 12 October 2004:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your Parliamentary Question about jobs created in East Lothian Parliamentary Constituency. (190145)

While statistics of new jobs created are not available explicitly, statistics from surveys enable comparisons to be made of net changes in numbers of jobs from year-to-year.

The attached table shows the information requested, relating to employee jobs in East Lothian for 1997 and 2002, which is the latest year available.

Number of employees[1] with workplace in East Lothian parliamentary constituency: 1997 and 2002

	Number total
1997	18,300
2002	19,800
Change from 1997 to 2002[2]	1,500

[1] Employee jobs only, not self-employed jobs.

[2] The 1997 to 2002 change has been rounded to the nearest hundred separately from rounded levels for 1997 and 2002.

Lorry Road User Charging

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people are employed working on the project to introduce lorry road user charging; and what their budget is. [190173]

John Healey: The Chancellor of the Exchequer made clear in the 2004 Spending Review (Cm 6237), that the Government remain committed to ensuring that all hauliers, regardless of their nationality, pay an amount related to the distance they travel on UK roads. It will be revenue neutral overall to hauliers who already contribute through UK fuel duty.

In 2003–04, the last complete year for which figures are available, around 70 people were employed by the Lorry Road-user charging (LRUC) programme.

HM Customs and Excise's most recent resource allocations and accounts were published in their Annual Report and Accounts 2002–03 (HC 52) and Spring Report 2004 (Cm 6224) and updated in the 2004 Spending Review. The allocated budget for LRUC in 2004–05 is £30 million. It would be inappropriate to disclose estimates for future years: exemption 7 (Effective management and operations of the public service) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information applies.

National Insurance Contributions Office

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many citizens in this financial year to date have been sent a letter by the National Insurance Contributions Office announcing a shortfall in contributions to state pensions; how many of those letters have been shown to be wrong; and how much of this is due to lost records. [189699]

Dawn Primarolo: I gave written statements to the House, on 16 May and 18 June 2003, that Inland Revenue was to resume the issue of letters telling people about shortfalls in their national insurance contributions records. That exercise has now been successfully completed. As stated in my answer of 5 February 2004, Official Report, columns 1350–351W, Inland Revenue sent out over 10 million letters between October 2003 and September 2004. These show any gaps in the recipient's contribution record for the years 1996–97 to 2001–02 and invite them to inform the Inland Revenue if the information shown is incomplete or incorrect, so that records can be corrected. Corrections to national insurance records may be necessary for a number of reasons but it is not possible to identify separately those resulting from lost records.

Tax Credits

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many adjustments have been made to payments in respect of tax credit claim 2004/08 001519 as a result of errors in his Department; and if he will list the stages in determining payment under this claim, showing the calculations at each stage. [190282]

Dawn Primarolo: The Inland Revenue may need to adjust payments during the year as a result of a change of circumstances, for example to avoid paying too much tax credits over the year as a whole. They will also adjust payments to recover an overpayment of tax credits from a previous year. Their approach to payment adjustments and the recovery of overpayments is explained in the Code of Practice 26 'What happens if we have paid you too much tax credit?' and a copy has been placed in the Commons Library.

It would not be appropriate for me to discuss publicly the cases of individual customers. However, the Inland Revenue wrote to the hon. Member on 9 September 2004 and the Tax Credit Office are speaking regularly with the constituent concerned about their tax credits claim and payments.

John Thurso: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many overpayments of tax credits have been made in Scotland in this financial year; what the value of those overpayments is; and how many of these overpayments are subject to recovery. [190163]

Dawn Primarolo: Overpayments of 2004–05 awards will normally be recognised after the end of the year when incomes for the year are known and final decisions taken on entitlement.

Awards are also adjusted during the year to take account of changes of circumstance or income. Where the amount payable is reduced, payments are adjusted so as to pay out the right amount for the year as a whole. This is part of the normal operation of the tax credit system, and no count of such occurrences is maintained.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Pension Credit Entitlement

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what decisions he has reached on extending the period for which pension credit customers are allowed to go abroad without it affecting their entitlement. [189698]

Malcolm Wicks: No decision has yet been made. Officials are researching a range of options for potentially extending the period for which pension credit can continue to be paid for customers who go abroad for less than 52 weeks.

Pensioners (Mitcham and Morden)

Siobhain McDonagh: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will set out, with statistical evidence relating as closely as possible to the Mitcham and Morden constituency, the effects of changes in departmental policy since 1997 on the income of pensioners in the constituency. [189339]

Malcolm Wicks: The available information is set out as follows:

Nationally, the average pensioner household will be £1,350 per year, or £26 per week, better off in 2004–05 because of measures the Government have introduced, including pension credit, than they would have been under the 1997 system. The poorest third of pensioner households will be £1,750 per year, or £33 per week, better off. Figures for the average gains in Mitcham and Morden are not available. Figures available for the Mitcham and Morden constituency are as follows:

As at 30 September 2003 there were 12,700 pensioners in the Mitcham and Morden constituency in receipt of basic state pension[1]. These pensioners have benefited from the 7 per cent. above inflation increase that has been made to the basic state pension since 1997.

As at 31 August 2004 there were 3,365 pensioner households in receipt of pension credit in the parliamentary constituency of Mitcham and Morden. The average weekly pension credit payment was £51.86[2].

In October 2002, the upper age limit on claims for carer's allowance was abolished. This change means that carers aged 65 and over can now claim and gain entitlement to the allowance and to carer's additional amount in pension credit. As at May 2004, there were 140 people aged 65 and over entitled to carer's allowance in the parliamentary constituency of Mitcham and Morden[2].

The winter fuel payment and 80+ annual payment also make a positive contribution to the incomes of pensioners in the constituency. The one-off 70+ payment for households including someone aged 70 or over will help pensioners with their living expenses, including council tax bills. For data on these payments, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to her on 16 September 2004, Official Report, column 1747W.

HEALTH

Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much has been spent to date on setting up the Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health. [189668]

Ms Rosie Winterton: By the end of 2004–05, the total running and set up costs of the Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health (CPPIH) to date will be £66.76 million. This includes all costs associated with patients' forums. It also includes CPPIH set up costs in 2002–03 of around £2.5 million.

Colorectal Cancer

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people suffering from colorectal cancer are receiving treatment. [189667]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Department does not hold the information requested. However, data on finished admission episodes for of cancers of the colon and/or rectum is collected. This is shown in the table. These figures relate to 2002–03.

Primary diagnosis code	Total episodes
C18 (malignant neoplasm of colon)	87,884
C19 (malignant neoplasm of rectosigmoid junction)	14,840
C20 (malignant neoplasm of rectum)	46,759
C21 (malignant neoplasm of anus and anal canal)	2,521

Notes:

1. A finished admission episode is the first period of in-patient care under one consultant within one healthcare provider. Please note that admissions do not represent the number of in-patients, as a person may have more than one admission within a year.

2. The primary diagnosis is the first of up to 14 (7 prior to 2002–03) diagnosis fields in the hospital episode statistics (HES) data set and provides the main reason why the patient was in hospital.

3. Figures have not been adjusted for shortfalls in data (i.e. the data are ungrossed).

Continuing Care

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the consultancy work he has commissioned in the last 12 months concerning NHS continuing care; what the remit of the work was; when it was completed; and when he plans to publish it. [187860]

Dr. Ladyman: The only consultancy work commissioned centrally in the last 12 months has been the independent review of continuing care in nine strategic health authorities. The remit was to examine the review of criteria, progress with restitution and current processes. The work was commissioned in autumn 2003 and reported in June 2004. We will publish it in due course.

Dentistry

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients were registered with a NHS dentist in each primary care trust of the Surrey and Sussex Strategic Health Authority in each year since 1997. [188173]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The general dental service dental registration numbers for June each year since 1997 for primary care trusts (PCTs) in the Surrey and Sussex Strategic Health Authority are shown in the following table:

Primary care trust	1997	1998	1999	2000	2001	2002	2003	2004

Notes:

1. Changes in the registration periods for registrations starting after 31 August 1996 means that registration numbers for June 1997 and June 1998 are not on the same basis as later figures. Before that date, the registration period for adults was 24 months whilst children's registrations lasted until the end of the following calendar year. From 1 September 1996, registrations have lasted for 15 months from the end of the month of registration. The figures for some PCT areas will also be affected by the introduction in October 1998 and subsequent growth of the personal dental service.

2. Patients may access national health service dental treatment without being registered with a general dental service dentist, for example as a patient of a dental access centre.

Post-Laryngectomy Equipment

Mrs. Helen Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the difficulties in communication faced by people who have had laryngectomies. [188889]

Dr. Ladyman: No assessment has been carried out centrally.

Teriparatide

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment he has made of teriparatide for the treatment of osteoporosis; [189045]

(2) what guidance is given to local health trusts and local health boards about the availability of teriparatide on the NHS. [189046]

Dr. Ladyman: Teriparatide is being considered as part of the National Institute for Clinical Excellence's (NICE's) appraisal of the clinical effectiveness and cost effectiveness of technologies for the secondary prevention of osteoporotic fractures in postmenopausal women. NICE has developed guidance in consultation with a number of stakeholders. Final guidance was due to be published in October 2004, covering both England and Wales, but an appeal has been received against the final appraisal determination and guidance on this technology. NICE has arranged for the appeal panel to convene on 22 October 2004 to hear oral representations from the appellant. Full details are available on the NICE website at www.nice.org.uk.

In August 1999, the Department issued Health Service Circular 1999/176, which asks national health service bodies to continue with local arrangements for the managed introduction of new technologies where guidance from NICE is not available at the time the technology first became available. These arrangements should involve an assessment of all the available evidence. The circular applies to England only.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Bellamy's Cafeteria (Contractors)

Tom Cox: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what requirements were stipulated to contractors working on the refurbishment of Bellamy's cafeteria with respect to (a) hours of work, (b) noise levels of works and (c) dust levels; and if he will make a statement on when the work will be finished. [189525]

Derek Conway: The contractor is required to comply with the Control of Noise (Code of Practice for Construction and Open Sites) Order 1984 Regulations and BS 5228, the Code of Practice for Noise Control on Construction and Demolition Sites. The contractor is further required to comply with any local authority restrictions. Construction methodology and timing of work are reviewed with the contractor on a regular basis.

The control of dust is covered by conditions in the contract relating to nuisance under which the contractor is required to take all reasonable precautions to prevent such nuisance. The contractor also has responsibilities under health and safety legislation.

One of the project's stipulations is that the work to refurbish Bellamy's Kitchen must be completed within the summer months when the House is in recess, including the two week September return; a period of some 10 weeks. Given the significant amount of work involved maximum flexibility has been afforded: 24 hours per day, seven days a week working is available.

The works were forecast to be completed by the return of the House.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Fallen Stock

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what progress her Department has made in establishing a national fallen stock collection scheme; how many and what proportion of livestock farms have registered; and what plans she has for its future development. [190128]

Mr. Bradshaw: The Board of the National Fallen Stock Company, in partnership with Government and the livestock industry, remain on target to launch the scheme this autumn. We will not know how many farmers will register until the scheme begins. Future development of the scheme is a matter for the Board but the Government are committed to providing £20 million over three years to help establish it on a firm footing.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Iraq

7. Linda Gilroy: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what effects instability in Iraq is having on his Department's work on reconstruction. [190361]

Hilary Benn: Present levels of instability in Iraq have slowed the pace of reconstruction. However, DFID's programmes are designed to be flexible and responsive to the current difficult security environment. Extensive measures are in place to safeguard the well-being of DFID employees and contractors working in Iraq. In southern Iraq, we are about to complete a substantial programme of infrastructure rehabilitation; and capacity-building and employment generation projects are well under way. Capacity-building support to key Iraqi ministries in Baghdad, and support for civil society, the judiciary and independent media, are also continuing.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much from departmental sources was spent in Iraq from June to September. [190354]

Hilary Benn: In the four months June to September this year, DFID disbursed a total of £15.95 million on Iraq. £15.5 million of this was programme funds, and £0.45 million was administrative costs.

In the three months between the handover of power to the Iraqi Interim Government on 28 June and the end of September, DFID disbursed a total of £11.7 million, of which £11.35 million was programme funds and £0.36 million was administrative costs.

Ethiopia

8. Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance his Department is giving to Ethiopia; and if he will make a statement. [190362]

Hilary Benn: UK development assistance to Ethiopia is increasing rapidly from £44 million in 2003–04 to £85 million in 2005–06. Half of our support is direct support to the Government of Ethiopia's budget to enable them to increase their pro-poor spending with additional cooperation focusing on food security, capacity building and education plus support to tackle HIV/AIDS.

Caribbean (Extreme Weather)

9. Michael Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance his Department has given to British dependencies and Commonwealth countries in (a) the Caribbean and (b) Central America affected by extreme weather conditions in the last year; and if he will make a statement. [190363]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: Details of DFID's disaster relief to Caribbean countries that have been seriously affected by recent Hurricanes Ivan and Jeanne were provided to the House in the oral statement of 14 September 2004 and written statement of 16 September 2004 by the Secretary of State for International Development. A further written statement, updating the House, was provided on 12 October 2004.

In addition to the responses to the recent hurricanes, DFID also provided some £420,000 of humanitarian assistance to Haiti, in May 2004, following severe flooding. This humanitarian assistance supported the flood relief and recovery programmes of Action Aid, Save the Children Fund and the World Food Programme for the provision of basic services, food, and water and sanitation interventions.

Aid Projects

10. Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State, Department for International Development, what recent assessment he has made of co-operation between his Department and the EU on aid projects. [190384]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: DFID continually monitors and assesses cooperation with the European Union on aid projects. At a political level, the Secretary of State and I regularly meet with counterparts from other EU Member States and the European Commission. There is similar contact at an official level both at headquarters and field levels.

Nigeria

11. Brian White: To ask the Secretary of State, Department for International Development if he will make a statement on the outcome of his recent visit to Nigeria. [190385]

Hilary Benn: 80–90 million Nigerian's live in poverty; only India and China have more poor.

Whether Africa attains the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) depends on Nigeria. Reforms are underway in Nigeria and there is an opportunity for change. The Government have launched their poverty reduction strategy and restored macroeconomic stability.

Donor and creditor support is critical to maintain the momentum of reform. DFID has doubled its aid to £70 million next year.

The UK is also committed to helping Nigeria to reach a sustainable solution to its debt problems through the Paris Club's Evian Approach.

Agriculture Strategy

12. Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State, Department for International Development, if he will make a statement on his Department's agriculture strategy. [190387]

Hilary Benn: Following the launch of the 2003 Agriculture Policy Paper "Agriculture and poverty reduction: unlocking the potential", the Department for International Development has engaged in a consultative process seeking the views of others on ways to improve the effectiveness of our assistance to agriculture which will culminate in a new Agriculture Strategy Paper. This process has included an electronic forum that engaged over 550 participants and the development of 14 working papers providing material for the strategy. The first working papers are now available on our consultation website, and the remainder will be released shortly. DFID acknowledges the valuable input of NGOs, notably members of the UK Food Group, in this process. A summary draft of the strategy is being prepared, and we anticipate releasing this very shortly for wider consultation.

Millennium Development Goals

13. Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State, Department for International Development, if he will make a statement on the effectiveness of aid given (a) through the EU and (b) bilaterally in achieving the Millennium Development Goals. [190388]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: All EU member states, as well as the European Commission, are currently drawing up detailed reports on the contribution towards reaching the Millennium Development Goals. These are being prepared to a common format, agreed in advance, in order to allow comparisons to be drawn between the approaches and successes of each Member State, as well as the European Commission, in their respective development programmes.

The reports are due to be published later this year. There is no recent comparative analysis available at present which can match the thoroughness or comprehensiveness of these forthcoming reports.

Afghanistan

Mr Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will make a statement on his Department's support programmes for alternative livelihoods in Afghanistan. [189941]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: DFID's Alternative Livelihoods programme is an essential part of our overall strategy to reduce and eventually eliminate poverty in Afghanistan. It is also a key component of the fight against drugs. In 2003/04 DFID provided £6 million to our alternative livelihoods programme. We have budgeted for an additional £20 million over the next two years.

DFID is working with the Afghan Government to build the capacity of the key agricultural ministries (£2.1 million over three years) and have helped establish the Alternative Livelihoods working group, which acts as a forum for the Afghan Government, donors, UN Agencies and non-governmental organisations to co-ordinate activities and develop a strategic framework for the creation of sustainable alternative livelihoods.

DFID is funding pilot programmes in Badakshan (£1 million over two years) and Eastern Hazarajat (£3.7 million over four years) to develop agricultural and non-farm alternatives to poppy cultivation. These projects are being supported by a microfinance programme targeted at the rural poor (£3 million over two years) and a fund for practical research into alternative livelihoods (£3 million over three years).

DFID is also working with village development councils through the National Solidarity Programme (£13 million over three years) to help communities address their own development priorities. To date 5,947 village development councils have been elected, 3,258 projects have been approved and $29 million in block grants has been disbursed to fund community projects including the construction of roads, water supply systems, irrigation canals, hydro-power for electricity, public baths, schools and weaving facilities.

Forests (Africa)

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what action he is taking to try to prevent the loss of forest cover in Africa. [190386]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: DFID supports developing countries in Africa to make forest resources contribute more effectively to poverty reduction. DFID's work aims to improve the livelihoods of poor people and to maintain—and increase where possible—the national and global public goods provided by forests. DFID is helping to develop forest policy, implement reforms, and strengthen forest governance in Ghana, Cameroon, Malawi, Kenya and South Africa.

DFID supports the Africa Forest Law Enforcement and Governance process to help raise awareness of the problems of illegal logging and the commitment to tackle them. In addition DFID invests about £29 million a year in the Global Environment Facility, a significant share of which is spent on forest conservation.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Aboriginal Artefacts

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions she has had with the lenders on securing the return of two bark etchings and an Aboriginal ceremonial headdress on loan to the Museum Victoria in Melbourne, Australia; why such items have not been returned; and if she will make a statement. [189148]

Estelle Morris [pursuant to her reply, 16 September 2004, Official Report, c. 1699–1700W]: In my previous reply I stated that the current Emergency Declarations were due to expire on 18 September. This was incorrect. The Declarations in question expired on 14 September, and further Declarations were imposed on 15 September.

Computer Misuse

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many cases of computer misuse there were in (a) her Department and (b) Ofcom this year to date; how many of those cases resulted in disciplinary action; and what measures are in place to (i) discourage and (ii) monitor computer misuse. [190262]

Mr. Caborn: (a) There have been no cases of computer misuse in the Department to date this year.

All staff in the Department must sign our Acceptable Use Policy before e-mail or internet access is provided. The policy has to be signed off on an annual basis thereafter.

All use of departmental IT systems is monitored and filtering systems are in place to prevent access to unacceptable material.

(b) With respect to Ofcom, the matter raised is the responsibility of the Office of Communications (Ofcom) as independent regulator. Accordingly, my officials have asked the Chief Executive of Ofcom to respond directly to the hon. Member. Copies of the Chief Executive's letter will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

TRANSPORT

Information and Communication Specialists

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many information and communication technology specialists are in full-time employment in the Department. [189596]

Charlotte Atkins: 401 information and communication technology specialists are in full-time employment in the Department for Transport.

Rural Bus Subsidy

Mr. Anthony D. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what (a) the allocation of the Rural Bus Subsidy Grant to each local authority has been to date and (b) the percentage level each local authority has set for the revenue cost of an individual bus service to be met by the farebox before the subsidy is allocated to it. [190045]

Charlotte Atkins: The following table shows the Rural Bus Subsidy Grant allocations since its introduction in 1998. A table indicating the Rural Bus Subsidy Grant allocations awarded to authorities in each year since 1998–99 has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

It is for each authority to determine its own criteria for deciding whether particular services should be supported by the grant allocated to them, taking account of local needs and priorities and value for money. Information is not collected centrally on the criteria adopted by individual authorities. The percentage of cost met from the farebox is just one of the options available to authorities in this respect.

Transport Schemes

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the cost to benefit ratios of all the transport schemes which he has approved in principle within the last three years, including those agreed for implementation by Transport for London. [188031]

Mr. McNulty: The Benefit Cost Ratio (BCR) is one input into a decision about whether or not a project should go ahead. It shows those impacts that have established monetary valuations. There are often other significant impacts to which a monetary value cannot easily be attached, but which are accounted for when assessing overall value for money (vfm). Environmental and regeneration impacts for example could be very large and could alter the assessment of vfm from that implied by looking at the BCR alone. In some cases, where the other impacts of the scheme are sufficiently negative, a high BCR may not mean a scheme offers good vfm. Conversely, in other cases, where the positive impacts are sufficiently large a low BCR may not mean that the scheme offers poor vfm.

In addition to the value for money assessment, there are other considerations that affect whether a project should go ahead, including:

Practicality

Deliverability

Public acceptability

Distributional and equity impacts

Affordability and finance sustainability

The achievement of central government, local and regional objectives

The amelioration of identified problems

The following table reports the latest estimates available of the BCR of the transport schemes, which the Department for Transport has approved in principle or provisionally approved within the last three years.

For local schemes the local authority does a value for money appraisal of the scheme using the New Approach to Appraisal (NATA)—launched in 1998—and submits that to the Department for independent scrutiny. The appraisal is assessed by the Department, and the BCRs listed are the Department's own best estimate, using the evidence presented in the promoter's appraisal and the information uncovered during the Department's own assessment process.

The schemes were appraised in different years and due to changes in the Government's appraisal methodology during this period, the BCRs reported have not all been calculated on the same basis, so they are not directly comparable between schemes.

The list does not include those schemes agreed for implementation by Transport for London, since the decision to approve such schemes is the responsibility of the Mayor. The exception has been the Thames Gateway Bridge, where the Department have offered to provide some Private Finance Initiative (PFI) credits, and borough streetlighting PFIs. These are included in the table.

Notes:

1. Markham Employment Growth Zone: BCR -3.54

The Markham Employment Growth Zone originated as a response to the Coalfield Task Force's Report "Making the Difference—A New Start for England's Coalfield Communities". It is principally a regeneration scheme for the former colliery and surrounding land. The method of calculating the BCR does not capture the wider economic benefits that the scheme will deliver.

2. Ilkeston-Awsworth Link Road: BCR 0.81

Ilkeston-Awsworth Link Road is justified largely on environmental grounds. The method of calculating the BCR does not capture the environmental benefits that the scheme will deliver.

3. Ryde Esplanade Transport Interchange: BCR 0.36

Ryde Esplanade Interchange is the main entry point to the Isle of Wight. It is primarily aimed at improving the quality of facilities, increasing security and encouraging tourism, which accounts for 24 per cent. of the island's economy. The method of calculating the BCR does not capture these wider benefits the scheme will deliver.

4. Merseytram: BCR 1.1

The scheme has significant benefits that are not included in the monetised BCR. These include significant regeneration and social inclusion benefits, as well as beneficial impacts on air quality and greenhouse gases.

Underground Schemes

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what his Department's policy is on new urban underground schemes as a practical solution to future transport management. [189921]

Charlotte Atkins: It would be for local transport authorities, including Passenger Transport Authorities and the Mayor for London, to propose new urban underground schemes as part of their plans. Each scheme would need to be considered on the basis of its value for money, including its wider benefits, and affordability. The cost of such schemes means it is unlikely they would be justified except on corridors with the highest level of demand.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Chagos Islanders

Peter Bottomley: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister which departmental Ministers have responsibility for discussions with West Sussex county council about the costs of looking after Chagos Islanders arriving at Gatwick. [190153]

Phil Hope: Officials from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, Government Office for the South East, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Department of Health, Department for Work and Pensions and the Prime Minister's Office met West Sussex county council on Thursday 30 September to discuss support for Chagos Islanders arriving at Gatwick airport.

Corporation of London (Planning Policy)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will initiate an inquiry into the planning policies and procedures of the Corporation of London. [190161]

Keith Hill: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister has no plans to initiate an inquiry into the planning policies and procedures of the Corporation of London. As local authorities are elected autonomous bodies, the Government do not routinely comment on or investigate their day-to-day administration of the planning system. Local authorities are accountable to their electorate, their Auditor, and ultimately to the Courts.

Historic Areas (New Buildings)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will meet the Royal Institute of British Architects to discuss the standards and quality of new buildings in historic areas, with particular reference to the City of London. [190157]

Keith Hill: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister has no plans to discuss these issues with the Royal Institute of British Architects.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will meet representatives of the construction industry to discuss their responsibilities for quality building in historic areas, with particular reference to the City of London. [190158]

Keith Hill: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister has no plans to discuss these issues with the construction industry.

Traveller Sites (Buckinghamshire)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many (a) local authority and (b) private traveller sites there were in the Buckingham constituency in each year since 2002. [191071]

Keith Hill: The Gypsy and Traveller Count collects data by local authority area rather than by constituency. However, the following data collected from Aylesbury Vale district council are available:

	Number of local authority sites	Number of private sites
2002	1	4
2003	2	4
2004	2	6

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many traveller (a) caravans and (b) families were on (i) authorised and (ii) unauthorised sites in the Buckingham constituency in each of the last three years. [191072]

Keith Hill: The Gypsy and Traveller Count collects data by local authority area rather than by constituency. However, the following data collected from Aylesbury Vale district council are available:

	Authorised caravans	Unauthorised caravans
January 2002	19	11
July 2002	19	10
January 2003	32	45
July 2003	26	18
January 2004	21	10

Note:

Information relating to the Count carried out in July 2004 will be published shortly.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

Parliamentary Resource Unit

Mr. Salter: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission to what grade of parliamentary pass staff working for the Parliamentary Resource Unit are entitled. [189275]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: The staff working for the Parliamentary Resource Unit have a Members' Research Assistant photo-identity pass, either a 9B (permanent) or a 9D (temporary).

Recycling

Mr. Hancock: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission what quantity of (a) glass, (b) paper, (c) cardboard, (d) plastic, (e) metal and (f) other materials have been (i) recovered and (ii) recycled from the waste stream of the parliamentary estate in each of the last three years; what percentage this represents of total waste in each case; what plans there are to increase the amount recycled; and if he will make a statement. [189755]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: In the last three financial years the quantities of waste recycled were as follows:

	2002–03	2003–04	2004–05 (4 months)
Glass (tonnes)	256	173	61
Paper and cardboard (tonnes)	263	379	121
Metal (tonnes)	46	50	[1]—
Oil (tonnes)	7	4	3
In addition, fluorescent tubes and toner cartridges were recycled.
Percentage of total waste recycled	25	26	28
Percentage of waste recovered	100	100	100

[1] Extracted at incinerator. Not separately weighed.

Recycling means that an item is reused. Recovery means that the waste is utilised in some way, for example incineration to generate electricity. Percentages of waste recycled and recovered exceed Government targets, which are to recycle 25 per cent. and recover 40 per cent.

The Waste Recycling Steering Group meets regularly and works closely with its contractors to maximise the amount of waste which is recycled from the parliamentary estate.

Summer Works Programme

Mr. Gale: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission what estimate he has made of the cost of the summer works programme in 2004; and what estimate he has made of what the cost would have been had the House not been sitting in September. [190008]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given to the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill) on 12 October 2004, Official Report, column 203W.

Mr. Gale: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission what the cost of the summer works programme in 2003 was; and what estimate he has made of what the cost would have been had the House not sat in September 2003. [190009]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: The estimated cost of the summer works programme for 2003 was some £4.5 million and the estimate of the cost if the House had not sat in September was around £4.4 million.

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many meetings of the Welsh Grand Committee there have been in each year since 1997; where the meetings were held; and what the subject matter of debate for each Committee meeting was. [189916]

Mr. Touhig: There have been 27 meetings of the Welsh Grand Committee, of which, all except five have taken place in Westminster.

The meeting on 30 June 1997 took place in Mold; 5 May 1998 in Carmarthen; 13 July 1998 in Merthyr Tydfil; 22 February 1999 in Aberaeron; and 12 March 2001 took place in Cwmbran.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Asylum Seekers (Peterborough)

Tony Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library his Department's report on the impact on Peterborough of asylum seekers. [187954]

Mr. Browne: So far as can be ascertained, no such report exists. Recent press references to such a report appear to relate in fact to a Peterborough council funding application which extracted comments from the city's own Community Safety Audit of 2003. In this application, asylum seeking was listed as one of a combination of factors affecting service provision.

Drug Offences

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people in the Thames Valley area were convicted of or cautioned for drug offences in (a) 2000, (b) 2001 and (c) 2002; and what proportion this represented of persons convicted of or cautioned for all indictable offences in the Thames Valley in each year. [189977]

Caroline Flint: Figures for the number of persons cautioned and found guilty for drug offences for Thames valley area for 2000 to 2002 are set out in the following table.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people in the Thames Valley Police Force home area were dealt with for supply offences involving Class A drugs in (a) 2000, (b) 2001 and (c) 2002. [189969]

Caroline Flint: Figures for the number of persons cautioned and found guilty for Class A drug supply offences in the Thames valley area for 2000 to 2002 are set out in the table.

The information is taken from the Home Office Court Proceedings and Cautions Database and relates to persons cautioned and found guilty for drug offences.

Forensic Science Service

Adam Price: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the Government's outline business case for the future working of the Forensic Science Service. [188474]

Caroline Flint: It is not intended to publish the outline business case because of the need to maintain strict commercial confidentiality. However, a detailed summary will be submitted in evidence to the Science and Technology Select Committee, which has announced an inquiry into the Government's plans for the Forensic Science Service.

Juveniles (Detention)

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he is taking to improve the (a) accuracy, (b) quality and (c) legal integrity of warrants for detention of juveniles. [188235]

Paul Goggins: I will write to the hon. Member.

Mobile Phones

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been charged with using mobile telephones while driving since the law was introduced; and if he will make a statement. [189997]

Ms Blears: Data on the numbers of people charged by the police are not collected centrally.

Data on police action (written warnings, fixed penalty notices and court proceedings) for 2003 on the new offence of driving while using a hand held mobile telephone will not be available until early 2005. Use of a hands free mobile phone is not part of the new specific offence.

2004 data will be published in autumn 2005.

National Offender Management Service

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish a business case for the National Offender Management Service. [175827]

Paul Goggins: The case for the establishment of the National Offender Management Service (NOMS) is outlined in Patrick Carter's independent report "Managing Offenders—Reducing Crime" published along with the Government response "Reducing Crime—Changing Lives" on 6 January 2004. The draft detailed business case will be presented to the NOMS Programme Board on 22 November for discussion.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the role will be of the regional offender managers in the National Offender Management Service structure. [190114]

Paul Goggins: The Regional Offender Managers (ROMS) will have the critical task of implementing end-to-end offender management across prisons and probation. They will hold the budgets for prison and probation and commission services from both sectors, using contracts and service level agreements to manage performance. They will be developing further contestability across prisons and probation. In addition, they will develop and implement the regional reducing re-offending action plans and regional resettlement strategies.

Police Searches

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue guidance to (a) the police and (b) the Crown Prosecution Service on the appropriate time limit within which police officers should search premises, after a suspect has emerged, in relation to section 32 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. [187969]

Ms Blears: As indicated in my earlier response to the hon. Member on 1 September 2004, Official Report, column 867W, paragraph 4.2. of Code of Practice B of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act (PACE) 1984 sets out instruction on the use of powers under section 32 of PACE. That section provides that a constable may enter and search any premises in which a suspect was when arrested or immediately before they were arrested for evidence. Code B does not provide guidance of the meaning of "immediate" but we will consult on the need to expand on this when we next review the PACE Codes in summer 2005.

Prison Sentences

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what (a) the average time served in prison under sentence, (b) the average time served in prison on remand, (c) the total time served in prison and (d) the average sentence length of receptions into prison under sentence for young offenders aged 18 to 21 was in each of the last five years. [187233]

Paul Goggins: Information on the average time served in prison by young offenders aged 18 to 21 discharged is readily available only for those under sentence as provided in the tables.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners declared themselves to be of a particular religion when they entered prison in the last 12 months; and which religions these were. [190121]

Paul Goggins: The religious affiliation recorded on the prison establishments IT system for prisoners first received into prison between July 2003 and June 2004 is shown in the table.

Seat Belts

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) fixed penalty notices, (b) proceedings at magistrates courts and (c) written warnings for not wearing seat belts there were in England and Wales in 2003 and for each of the previous three years. [190025]

Ms Blears: Available information on police action for the motoring offence of driving or riding in a motor vehicle while not wearing a seat belt for the calendar years 2000 to 2002 is given in the table.

2003 data will not be available until early 2005.

Speed Cameras

Sandra Gidley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the possible effects of (a) forward facing and (b) rear facing speed camera flash on a driver driving at night. [190098]

Caroline Flint: No forward or rear-facing speed camera is type approved until it has undergone rigorous testing against set specifications that ensures its reliability and safety. The peak intensity and duration of the flash are less than levels which are commonly encountered from other sources when driving at night.

Sandra Gidley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment has been made of the health and safety implications of speed cameras. [190099]

Caroline Flint: No speed enforcement equipment is type approved for use until it has undergone rigorous testing against set specifications by the Home Office Police Scientific Development Branch. This includes an assessment of health and safety factors to ensure that neither any operator nor any road user is put at risk by the operation of the equipment.

Violent Crime (Leicester)

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the level of violent crime in Leicester was in each year since 1997. [186262]

Ms Blears: Leicester is a Crime and Disorder Reduction Partnership (CDRP) area. Recorded crime data at CDRP level has only been published from 1999–2000 onwards. Violent crime comprises violence against the person, sexual offences and robbery. In 2003–04, at least 52 per cent. of all recorded violence against the person involved no injury.

The available information is given in the table.

Violent crime recorded by the police in Leicester

	Number of offences
1999–2000	6,851
2000–01	6,889
2001–02	7,544
2002–03	10,347
2003–04	11,430

Note:

Numbers of recorded crimes are affected by changes in reporting and recording practice. In particular, changes to the counting rules in 1998 and the introduction of the National Crime Recording Standard in April 2002 led to an increase in the number of crimes recorded by the police.

The British Crime Survey (BCS) also provides data on the level of violent crime in England and Wales. However, due to the variability of specific offence figures at police force area level regional figures only are available. Data at regional level have been published as a rate per 10,000 adults since the 2001–02 BCS and are presented for the relevant region in the table.

	Total BCS violence rate per 10,000 adults for the East Midlands Region
2001–02	621
2002–03	578
2003–04	600

Note:

The apparent difference between rates in 2002–03 and in 2003–04 is not statistically significant.

Source:

2001–02, 2002–03, 2003–04 BCS interviews.

Half of all violent incidents reported to the BCS during 2003–04 did not result in injury to the victim. However, this does not mean that public concern about violent crime is unjustified or that the ordeal of victims is not traumatic, even if injury has not occurred.

HEALTH

Adverse Drug Reactions

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reasons only a proportion of adverse incident reports are investigated by the Medicines and Healthcare Products Regulatory Agency as stated in its Annual Report and Accounts 2003–04. [189259]

Ms Rosie Winterton: All reports of adverse incidents involving medical devices received by the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency (MHRA) are categorised according to the level of risk associated with the event.

Only the most serious of these incidents, involving actual, or the potential for, death or serious injury to patients or user, become the subject of in-depth investigations by medical device specialists within the MHRA. These are listed as "adverse incident reports—number investigated" in the MHRA's annual report.

Typically, it is these investigations that often lead to the publication of advice to the health service.

The majority of incident reports are subject to a standard investigation, led by the device manufacturer and supervised by the MHRA.

Minor incidents that do not require immediate action are recorded on the MHRA's surveillance database for "information only" and, along with all other reported incidents, are subject to a continuous process of trend identification and analysis.

Further details of medical device adverse incident reporting and investigation processes are published by the MHRA in Device Bulletin DB2004(01)—Adverse Incident Reports 2003. This contains more detailed figures for the calendar year 2003. A copy of this publication has been placed in the Library.

Air Ambulance Services

David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how air ambulance services used by the NHS are funded in (a) the East Midlands and (b) England; and if he will make a statement. [190244]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Since 1 April 2002, the cost of clinical staff on air ambulances has been met by the national health service on a continuing basis.

Departmental Recycling

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the latest available 12 month figures are for the proportion of the Department's redundant documentation, waste paper and card that is recycled; and if he will make a statement on the Department's recycling policy. [188692]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Department's administrative estate has a cleaning contract, which encompasses waste management. Within this all-redundant documentation, paper and card is collected and processed for recycling.

The Department has an active sustainable development policy based upon the requirements of the framework for sustainable development on the Government estate.

Food/Advertising Industries

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the meetings he held with representatives of (a) the food industry and (b) the advertising industry between 1 February and 1 May. [189687]

Ms Rosie Winterton: No such meetings have taken place in the period specified.

Health Public Bodies

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 13 September 2004, Official Report, columns 1470–71W, on health public bodies, when decisions will be taken on how the savings from the Departmental review of arm's length bodies will be spent. [189890]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The resources freed up for frontline investment as a result of the review of arm's length bodies (ALBs) will be part of the normal budget allocation process in the light of the 2004 spending review settlement.

Planning for the implementation of the ALB review is underway and will involve ALBs, the devolved administrations and other interests. Implementation will be completed by 2007–08.

Health Services

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what strategies his Department uses to involve members of the public in decision making in local health services. [189669]

Ms Rosie Winterton [holding answer 12 October 2004]: We have established patients' forums to get the views of members of the public about health services and feed these back to national health service trusts. Primary care trust (PCT) patients' forums have a specific role to promote public involvement in local decision-making processes that affect their health.

There is also a statutory duty on NHS trusts, PCTs, NHS foundation trusts and strategic health authorities to involve the public in decision making in local health services. It is then up to local bodies to implement this duty in ways that best meet local needs. In addition, democratically elected councillors who are members of overview and scrutiny committees have the function of scrutinising all matters relating to the planning, provision and operation of health services in the area of the local authority.

Information and Communication Technology

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many information and communication technology specialists are in full-time employment in the Department. [189586]

Ms Rosie Winterton: There are 120 information and communication technology specialists in full-time employment in the Department.

Mysthenia Gravis

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision the Government is making to finance research projects into the (a) causes of, (b) consequences of and (c) treatments for mysthenia gravis. [189529]

Ms Rosie Winterton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) on 4 October 2004, Official Report, column 1987W.

Packaging Regulations (Medicines)

Dr. Pugh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans his Department has to amend regulations relating to the packaging of prescription drugs and proprietary medicines, with particular reference to issues of child safety. [189302]

Ms Rosie Winterton: New legislation requiring the use of child resistant packaging was introduced in October 2003. Certain aspirin, paracetamol and iron-containing medicines must now be supplied in child resistant packaging. Medicines newly authorised must comply with the requirement now and for products already authorised, compliance must be achieved by October 2005. The Government will continue to keep the issue of child safety under review and if particular medicines are considered to pose a problem, the legal requirements may be revised.

Post-Laryngectomy Equipment

Mrs. Helen Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to make available to people who have had laryngectomies on prescription the base plate for the hands free valve. [188888]

Ms Rosie Winterton: A number of base plates are currently listed in part IX of the Drug Tariff and therefore may be prescribed through the national health service. Some of these are compatible for use with the hands free valve for people who have had laryngectomies. It is for appliance manufacturers to apply for their products to be listed as an appliance in part IX of the Drug Tariff to enable them to be prescribed under the NHS. A NHS trust or foundation trust may provide base plates free of charge where appropriate.

Prostate Cancer

Ross Cranston: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to regulate the sale of do-it-yourself PSA tests. [189569]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Prostate specific antigen test kits are in vitro diagnostic medical devices and as such they are regulated by the Medical Devices Regulations 2002.

Public Relations

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the salary costs to the Department were for employees working in public relations and publicity in each year since 1997. [183852]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Information on staff working in the Department's communications directorate in public relations and publicity in each year since 1997 to 2002–03 can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The total expenditure on communications directorate staff in 2003–04 was £4.07 million.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Benefits

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what the (a) capital limits and (b) earnings disregards are for each income related benefit; and on what date each of the limits and disregards was first set. [188720]

Mr. Pond: The requested information has been placed in the Library.

Child Support Agency

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many Child Support Agency enforcement cases against self employed non-resident parents there have been in the last three years; and what percentage have been successful in recovering payment. [190270]

Mr. Pond: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mr. Doug Smith. He will write to the hon. Member with the information requested.

Letter from Doug Smith to Mr. Chris Ruane, dated 13 October 2004:

In reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the Child Support Agency the Secretary of State promised a substantive reply from the Chief Executive.

You asked the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, how many Child Support Agency enforcement cases against self employed non-resident parents there have been in the last three years; and what percentage have been successful in recovering payment.

We are unable to provide these figures as we do not record employment status on the relevant information system. However, I can tell you that the last 3 years:

	Number
Liability orders were granted by the court	7,814
Third party debt orders lodged were lodged at court	608
Charging orders were lodged at court	718
Committal files have been referred to solicitors	328

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what the total amount is of maintenance arrears outstanding in respect of self-employed non-resident parents who are subject to or awaiting CSA enforcement action. [190271]

Mr. Pond: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mr. Doug Smith. He will write to the hon. Member with the information requested.

We are unable to provide the information as we do not separately identify those cases whose main source of income is from self-employment.

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many Child Support Agency enforcement cases in respect of self-employed non-resident parents are outstanding. [190453]

You asked the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, how many Child Support Agency enforcement cases in respect of self-employed non-resident parents are outstanding.

There are currently 14,856 cases with our specialist enforcement teams. I am unable to say how many of these derive their main source of income from self-employment.

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many requests for traces the Child Support Agency have made to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency in the last three years under the Service Level Agreement. [190454]

Mr. Pond: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mr. Doug Smith. He will write to the hon. Member with the information requested.

You asked the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, how many requests for traces the Child Support Agency have made to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency in the last three years under the Service Level Agreement.

In the period 1 April 2002 to 31 August 2004 a total of 1,319 referrals were made for information to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency.

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what percentage of the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency traces carried out for the Child Support Agency were successful; and how many led to further enforcement action. [190455]

Mr. Pond: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mr. Doug Smith. He will write to the hon. Member with the information requested.

In the period 1 April 2002 to 31 August 2004 we made 1,319 referrals for information to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency. Of these 393 were successful in gaining the information sought. Our records do not show how many then led to enforcement action.

Pension/Benefit Payments

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what deadlines have been set regarding the conversion to direct payment; and if he will make a statement on the progress made so far. [190154]

Mr. Pond: The Department is on course to meet the Public Service Agreement target to pay 85 per cent. of our customers by direct payment by 2005.

Research has shown that nine out of 10 of our customers who have chosen to receive their pension or benefit into an account have found it a more flexible, convenient and safer method of getting their money.

Key figures on the progress of conversion to direct payment are available in the House of Commons Library updated every four weeks.

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what assistance his Department has given to pensioners with (a) mental and (b) physical health problems in choosing how they wish to have their pension paid. [190283]

Mr. Pond: We have liaised with customer representative groups (including CAB, Help the Aged, Age Concern, MIND) to ensure there is a shared understanding of the needs of our customers.

All customers including pensioners are being provided with all the information they need on all of their "account options", including which accounts can be used at post office branches. It will be up to the customers themselves to decide which type of account they wish to have their money paid into. Customers will need to look at all of the features of the different options and choose an account to suit their individual needs and circumstances.

Cheque payments will be available from later this month for those customers who are unable to open or manage an account.

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what procedures he has put in place to (a) detect and (b) monitor fraud in relation to chip and pin numbers for cards for withdrawal of pensions and benefits. [190284]

Mr. Pond: Card fraud is entirely a matter for the banks, and for Post Office Ltd. in respect of the post office card account. The banking industry takes plastic card fraud seriously and is extremely active in managing it. Once conversion to chip and pin is complete cards should be even more secure from fraudulent activities.

Direct Payment is far more secure than order books. We used to lose around £50 million a year on order book fraud and about 100 pensioners a week had their order books stolen. We will monitor Direct Payment closely and will take action as necessary to deal with fraud.

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what recent estimate his Department has made of how many pensioners do not have a bank account. [190287]

Mr. Pond: In the UK, 91 per cent. of pensioners have a bank or building society account which is suitable to receive Direct Payments.

It is evident that Direct Payment is becoming increasingly popular, particularly with pensioners. Around 80 per cent.[1] of pensioner new claims are being paid by Direct Payment.

[1] This figure was taken from the Family Resources survey 2002–03. DWP are the managers of this survey which is currently conducted by the Office of National Statistics and the National Centre for Social Research.

Note:

This information is from August 2004 data—GMS GB source, based on 100 per cent. of new claim records.

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what guidelines his Department has issued to call-centre operatives to ensure objective information is provided to pensioners on whether to opt for a bank account or a post office account; and if he will make a statement. [190456]

Mr. Pond: All Department for Work and Pensions staff including call centre operatives have been provided with information on all of the account options available to the customer. The role of our staff is to provide factual information on the features of the different account options available to the customer. The customer can then decide which type of account they choose to have their money paid into based on their individual needs and circumstances.

Independent research commissioned by DWP shows 93 per cent. of customers found that the information they received was clear and 93 per cent. were happy once they had transferred to Direct Payment.

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pension and benefit recipients failed to respond to direct payment form requests and are being paid through weekly Giro payments. [190458]

Mr. Pond: Key figures on the progress of conversion to Direct Payment are available in the Library updated every four weeks.

We are continuing to contact existing customers to invite them to provide account details. Those customers who have not yet provided their account details will be contacted again to discuss their account options, unless they have already advised the Department that they genuinely cannot open or manage an account.

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what estimate he has made of the cost to the Department of transferring all pension and benefit accounts to direct payments. [190459]

Mr. Pond: The total DWP one-off cost of the Payment Modernisation Programme over the full 10-year investment period 1999–2000 to 2009–10 is approximately £412 million.

However, significant savings are expected from both administration costs of around £440 million per annum and a reduction in fraud of around £50 million per annum.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

A-Level Results

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of students achieved (a) 1 and (b) 1–3 A-E grades at A Level (i) in England and (ii) at schools and colleges based in the Buckingham constituency in each year since 2001–02; and if he will provide breakdowns of those figures between (A) independent schools and colleges and (B) state schools and colleges. [189851]

Mr. Miliband: The percentage of students achieving (a) one and (b) one to three A-E grades at GCE/VCE A Level in independent schools and in maintained schools and FE Sector colleges in both England and the Buckingham constituency in 2001–02 and 2002–03:

		One GCE/VCE A level (or equivalent) pass		One to three GCE/VCE A level (or equivalent) passes

AQA

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the errors made by AQA in marking key stage 2 English SATS tests at St. Martin's Junior School in Epsom; how many other schools have experienced similar levels of errors in marking; what steps he is taking to ensure that AQA improves its processes; and what steps he is taking to ensure that AQA compensate schools for additional administrative costs incurred as a result of the errors in marking. [190376]

Mr. Miliband: I understand from the National Assessment Agency (NAA) that St. Martin's Junior School had 11 overall level changes for Key Stage 2 English.

It is not possible to break down the number of schools experiencing similar levels of error in marking. I shall write to the hon. Member with overall national figures for 2004 level changes in Key Stage 2 English when they become available and also place a copy in the Library.

The NAA, who are responsible, on behalf of the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority (QCA), for test administration, has awarded the 2005 contract for marking of the National Curriculum tests to Pearson Assessment and Testing. The Assessment and Qualifications Alliance (AQA) is working closely with Pearson to ensure that all lessons learnt from 2004 will be fed in to improving test delivery in 2005.

There is no provision for compensating schools for costs incurred by staff in checking pupils' scripts and preparing the application for review. However, where the outcome of the review shows that the quality of marking has not been to the expected standard, all review charges are refunded.

Education Funding Report

Dr. Pugh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assessment he has made of the Audit Commission's findings at paragraphs 28, 29 and 30 on page 11 of its report Education Funding 2004. [189749]

Mr. Miliband: The system of floors and ceilings referred to by the Audit Commission is in place to ensure that all councils receive an increase in funding each year and that there is stability in the funding of authorities. In setting the levels of floors and ceilings, Ministers are mindful of the need to make progression to the allocations implied by the formula in order to deliver the fairer distribution of funding which the formula review produced. We therefore agree with the Audit Commission that there is a balance to be struck in setting the level of the floors and ceilings.

The minimum funding guarantee that was introduced in 2004–05 has brought stability and certainty to schools budgets. It was considered appropriate to put in place such stability given the funding difficulties experienced by some schools in 2003–04. As a result of the introduction of the minimum funding guarantee two thirds of schools nationally received an increase above the level of the minimum guarantee while the remaining third of schools received a per pupil increase in funding in line with the guarantee.

Changes to a local education authority's funding formulae are matters for local discretion provided that they operate within the framework of the regulations. While the Audit Commission reports that some councils have suspended proposed changes to their funding formula, the survey was based on a sample of LEAs and was carried out before the start of the financial year 2004–05. Evidence from other authorities shows that there is no inherent need to suspend changes to formulae as a result of the minimum funding guarantee. Some authorities, in fact, have used the guarantee to provide transitional protection to ensure that such changes are phased in appropriately to ensure stability in school budgets.

Higher Education Act

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what discussions his Department has had with representatives of students in relation to the Higher Education Act 2004. [189658]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 11 October 2004]: We have regular discussions at ministerial and official level with student representative bodies including the National Union of Students.

Key Stage 2 Results

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of school pupils achieved level 4 at key stage 2 in (a) English and (b) Maths (i) in England and (ii) from schools based in the Buckingham constituency in (A) 2002 and (B) 2003. [189850]

Mr. Miliband: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) on 10 May 2004, Official Report, column 34W.

Ofsted Reports

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what procedures are open to an individual teacher to seek independent re-examination of an Ofsted report; and if he will make a statement. [190031]

Mr. Miliband: This is a matter for the Ofsted. David Bell the HM Chief Inspector of Schools will write to the hon. Member and a copy of his reply will be placed in the Library.

School Admissions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what advice his Department has issued to (a) local education authorities and (b) schools on the weight to be given to the separate addresses of divorced parents seeking access to a school on the basis of geographical proximity. [190420]

Mr. Miliband [holding answer 11 October 2004]: Admission authorities must have regard to the School Admissions Code of Practice which gives advice on admission issues. In the case of children who live with parents with shared responsibility, the Code of Practice recommends that admission authorities ensure that their oversubscription criteria make clear how the 'home' address will be decided in a fair and considered and consistent way. It is therefore for admission authorities themselves to set out the basis on which they will consider the geographical proximity aspect for applications for children with parents who are divorced.

School Closures

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what procedures must be followed by a local education authority before it can close a non-selective single sex school where no similar alternative schools exist nearby; and what opportunities are available to parents of pupils at such a school who wish to make representations against proposed closure. [189738]

Mr. Miliband: The procedures for closing a non-selective single sex school are the same as those for closing any other maintained school. There are no special arrangements where there is no similar school nearby.

Those making proposals to close a school must first consult interested parties, ensuring that there is sufficient opportunity for interested parties to express their views. If they wish to proceed, they must then publish a notice in the local newspaper, at the entrance of the school and in a conspicuous place within the area (e.g. the local library). Following publication, there is a six-week representation period (or four weeks if the school is failing) during which anyone can make representations about the proposals. The proposals are normally then referred to the local School Organisation Committee (SOC). If the SOC cannot reach a unanimous decision, the proposals are referred to the schools adjudicator. The SOC and the adjudicator both have the power to approve the proposals, reject them or approve them with modifications.

In making their decision the SOC and schools adjudicator must have regard to guidance issued by the Secretary of State. This sets out a range of factors that must be considered. These include the views of interested parties, the impact of what is proposed on local standards and equal opportunities issues including, for proposals of this nature, access to single sex schooling for both boys and girls where there is parental demand.

School Provision

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what guidelines are in place to assist local education authorities plan future schools provision to take account of housing targets. [189540]

Mr. Miliband: It is the responsibility of each local education authority to plan school provision in its area taking account of changes in local population. The Department does not issue specific guidance on planning school provision to meet increases in housing, but does provide other guidance on the statutory processes for making changes to local school organisation and separate guidance on capital.

Proposals to provide new primary schools, or enlarge any existing schools, to meet population growth, must be subject to local consultation before being published. The final decision on the proposals will generally be taken by the local School Organisation Committee or, if they cannot agree unanimously, an independent adjudicator. Where an LEA proposes to establish a new secondary school they must publish details of the need for the school, inviting other promoters to submit proposals, and the Secretary of State will decide which of the proposals submitted should be approved.

The Department provides capital support for local authorities and schools to invest in school infrastructure, including for the provision of new pupil places. The Department allocates much of its capital resources to local authorities and schools by needs-related formulae, as they can best decide how to target their highest priority needs, in accordance with their asset management planning processes. Local authorities can also negotiate contributions from developers for new school provision, under section 106 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 (as substituted by the Planning and Compensation Act 1991). The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister provides guidance to local authorities about such agreements in its Circular 1/97.

Special Educational Needs

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how much funding has been made available to schools in Buckinghamshire from the special educational needs standard fund in (a) 2002–03, (b) 2003–04 and (c) 2004–05. [189844]

Mr. Miliband: Buckinghamshire local education authority was allocated £638,603 in 2002–03, and £640,468 in 2003–04, through the Standards Fund for Special Educational Needs. This included Government grant of 50 per cent. and local authority contribution of 50 per cent. From 2004–05, the special educational needs grant was merged into a single School Development Grant. The grant was allocated to schools for use for any purpose to promote school improvement, including special educational needs. Buckinghamshire's allocation for School Development grant of £5.9 million included £666,087 notionally for special educational needs. The amount of grant allocated to Buckinghamshire's schools will depend on local decisions. In 2002–03 and 2003–04, local education authorities were permitted to use half of their special educational needs allocation for central provision. In 2004–05, authorities were allowed to retain the same cash amount from the School Development Grant as they had retained from the special educational needs grant in 2003–04.

Student Finances

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of students who received (a) maximum student loans and (b) student grants from the Government were from families where the parents are divorced in the last year for which figures are available. [190084]

Dr. Howells: Data relating to the marital status of students' parents are not currently available centrally.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimate he has made of the amount raised by higher education institutions from fees paid by part-time students in the last year for which figures are available. [190085]

Dr. Howells: The available information is taken from the Higher Education Statistics Agency (HESA) Finance Record. In 2002/03, English HE institutions raised £385.6 million income from HE fees paid by part time UK and EU domiciled students. Of this, £181.7 million of income came from undergraduate fees and £203.9 million came from postgraduate fees. Figures for part time overseas domiciled students are not indicated separately.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimate he has made of the amount contributed to further education colleges by fee-paying students in the last year for which figures are available. [190086]

Dr. Howells: Information from the Learning and Skills Council, for the latest year available 2002–03 shows that tuition fee income collected by further education institutions from council funded adult students, their employers or other sources, was £155 million.

Surplus Places

Dr. Pugh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills whether permission for local authorities to amend their formulae for distributing funds to schools will depend on the progress they are able to make in reducing surplus places following the abolition of the surplus places rules. [189750]

Mr. Miliband: Local education authorities do not need permission to amend their formulae for distributing funds to schools. They are required to consult their schools and schools forum over any amendments they propose to make to the funding formula prior to the financial year in which such changes are introduced.

LEAs are responsible for planning school places in their area and have a duty to ensure that there are sufficient places and that high quality education is provided in a cost effective way. We expect LEAs to take parental preferences into account in the planning.

Teacher Substitution

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many teaching posts were (a) vacant and (b) filled by supply, temporary and agency teachers in (i) primary and (ii) secondary schools in the Buckinghamshire local education authority in January (A) 2002, (B) 2003 and (C) 2004. [189849]

Mr. Miliband: The table gives the total number of full-time vacancies and occasional teachers in service in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools in Buckinghamshire local education authority in January 2002, 2003 and 2004.

	2002	2003	2004
Nursery and primary schools
Vacancies	16	5	2
Occasional teachers	50	30	30
Secondary schools
Vacancies	32	34	28
Occasional teachers	50	50	60

Source:
Form 618g survey.

Vacancies include all advertised posts of at least one term's duration excluding those covered by a teacher with a contract of a term of more.

Teachers in occasional service are all those in supply service or with a contract of less than one month, including those employed through an agency, who were employed for the whole of the survey date.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Afghanistan

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the security situation in Herat in Afghanistan following the recent violence directed towards UN buildings and staff. [189887]

Mr. Rammell: President Karzai removed Ismail Khan as Governor of Herat on 11 September. Ismail Khan was offered a ministerial post with the Afghan transitional administration in Kabul but has declined it, and currently remains in Herat as a private citizen. The announcement of his removal was followed by some local unrest in Herat, during which seven people reportedly died. UN buildings were targeted and some UN and NGO staff withdrew temporarily from the city. They have since returned. The new Governor has taken office, the Afghan National Army and police force are keeping order, and there have been no reports of further serious violent incidents.

Tom Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions have taken place with warlords in Afghanistan to establish their views on holding elections in Afghanistan. [190247]

Mr. Rammell: Arrangements for elections in Afghanistan have been agreed by the Afghan Transitional Administration in consultation with the UN. We are not aware of any consultations being held directly with warlords on this issue.

Tom Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the intention is that the parliamentary elections in Afghanistan will take place in all parts of the country; and if he will make a statement. [190248]

Mr. Rammell: The Afghan Government's expressed intention is to hold nationwide parliamentary elections in spring 2005. No further details have yet been announced.

Tom Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimate has been made of the number of warlords who control areas of Afghanistan; what discussions are taking place with these people; and if he will make a statement. [190249]

Mr. Rammell: Afghanistan is governed by the Afghan Transitional Administration. President Karzai has acted on a number of occasions to remove regional governors who were ineffective or who were not loyal to central Government. Regional military commanders or warlords are involved in the UN-led process to demobilise and disarm militias. Latest UN figures show that this largely consensual process has succeeded in disarming more than 20,000 militia personnel (which is around a third of the total) and removing around 60 per cent. of heavy weapons from militia control. Kabul was declared free of heavy weapons on 1 September.

Azerbaijan

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the Government's policy is on the situation concerning Nagorno-Karabakh in the Republic of Azerbaijan; what recent representations he has made regarding the presence of Russian forces; what plans there are for (a) mediation and (b) the provision of (i) observers and (ii) peacekeeping forces by international organisations; and if he will make a statement. [189873]

Mr. Rammell: We will support any mechanism for the resolution of the Nagorno Karabakh dispute which both parties can accept and which has a realistic chance of delivering a lasting political settlement. The framework for discussing such mechanisms is the OSCE Minsk Group, co-chaired by Russia, the US and France. While the UK is not a member of the Minsk Group, we support its work and remain in close touch through the UK Special Representative to the South Caucasus, Sir Brian Fall.

The Personal Representative of the OSCE Chairman in Office arranges for periodic observation of the line of control from both the Armenian and Azerbaijani sides. There are no Russian forces in Nagorno Karabakh that we are aware of. At its summit in 1994, the OSCE agreed in principle to the deployment of a multi-national peacekeeping operation, following the conclusion of a political agreement on the cessation of the armed conflict, and established a High Level Planning Group (HLPG) to work on details of an operation. This point has not been reached but high level governmental contacts between Armenia and Azerbaijan continue on a regular basis with and without the facilitation of the Minsk Group.

Bakassi Peninsula

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Governments of (a) Nigeria and (b) Cameroon on the handover of the Bakassi peninsula. [189680]

Mr. Mullin: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn) discussed this issue with President Obasanjo in Nigeria on 7 September, and I did likewise with the Cameroonian High Commissioner in London on 20 September. We made clear our support for the International Court of Justice ruling, and that we look to Nigeria and Cameroon to negotiate the detail of its implementation with the support of the United Nations.

British Tourists (Murders)

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British tourists were murdered in each year since 1995, broken down by country. [189886]

Mr. Mullin: The number of British nationals murdered overseas since 1996 of whose deaths we have been notified is provided in the table below. We have no figures for 1995. We are unable to differentiate between tourists, business or other travellers.

We are in the process of transferring our consular records to a new system. Consequently there may be some inconsistencies in the data we are currently able to present.

China

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the Chinese authorities about the death sentence of Tenzin Deleg Rinpoche. [190002]

Mr. Rammell: We have raised the case of Tenzin Deleg Rinpoche with the Chinese authorities on several occasions and have supported EU demarches about his case. At the latest round of the biannual UK/China Human Rights Dialogue, held in London on 13–14 May, we asked for confirmation that his death sentence would [redacted] also raised concerns about the judicial process and requested a re-trial.

The EU included his case on the list of individual cases presented at the latest EU China Human Rights Dialogue, held on 24 September.

Correspondence

Sir Gerald Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will reply to the letter to him dated 20 July from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Mr. M. Abbass. [189708]

Mr. Mullin: My hon. Friend the Minister of State at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Douglas Alexander) replied on 5 October. I apologise for the delay in replying while inquiries with our High Commission in Islamabad were finalised.

EU Legislation

Mr. David: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of European legislation has lapsed during the last (a) year and (b) seven years. [190052]

Mr. MacShane: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, the Commission has identified more than 450 pieces of legislation which it considers could be repealed or formally recognised as obsolescent, and it will be putting proposals to do this to the Council and the European Parliament. As EU regulatory reform champions, we have strongly supported the Commission's work in this area and will continue to do so. It should be a priority for the new Commission too, and I welcome Commissioner Verheugen's comments on the issue in his recent European Parliament hearing. We are also working with EU partners on initiatives to use impact assessments as a basis for competitiveness testing, to simplify existing legislative proposals and encourage the use of alternatives to regulation.

Georgia

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the Government's policy is on the situation concerning South Ossetia in the Republic of Georgia; what recent representations he has made regarding the presence of Russian forces; what plans there are for (a) mediation and (b) the provision of (i) observers and (ii) peacekeeping forces by international organisations; and if he will make a statement. [189874]

Mr. Rammell: The Government support the territorial integrity of Georgia and Georgia's right to control its own borders. We believe that the conflict can only be resolved and a long-term sustainable solution found, by peaceful negotiation between the parties. To this end, the UK supports the work of the OSCE mission in Georgia, who have a special role in promoting the peaceful resolution of the South Ossetian conflict, and the work of the EU Special Representative to the South Caucasus. The UK's own Special Representative to the South Caucasus is also active, having most recently visited Georgia, including South Ossetia, on 22 to 25 September 2004.

The format for dialogue between the Georgians and the South Ossetians is through the Joint Control Commission, which also includes the Russians and the North Ossetians. This Commission met last in Russia at the end of September but there were no concrete outcomes.

Russian forces form part of the Joint Peacekeeping Forces (including Georgian and South Ossetian) that are present by agreement of these parties. OSCE monitors are also present by agreement of the relevant parties. The OSCE is currently considering increasing their number of monitors from six to 16, a proposal that we support.

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what Her Majesty's Government's policy is on the situation concerning Abkhazia in the Republic of Georgia; whether he has made any recent representations regarding the presence of Russian forces; whether there are any plans for mediation and the provision of observers and peacekeeping forces on the part of international organisations; and if he will make a statement. [189913]

Mr. Rammell: The Government support the territorial integrity of Georgia and Georgia's right to control its own borders. We believe that the conflict can only be resolved and a long-term sustainable solution found, by peaceful negotiation between the parties. Being a member of the Friends of the Secretary General on Georgia, the UK actively supports the dialogue process headed by the UN Special Representative of the Secretary General. Efforts are under way to prepare for another round of these talks but they are not imminent. The UK's own Special Representative to the South Caucasus is our senior official on the Friends Group. He often travels to the region and to capitals to explore possibilities to move towards a solution.

The Russian peacekeeping forces in Abkhazia are there by agreement of the parties to the dispute. A UN observer mission (UNOMIG), including a British component, is also present. This mission was established in 1993 to verify compliance of the Cease-Fire Agreement between Georgia and Abkhazia.

Gibraltar

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Gibraltar Government in order to ensure that it follows its obligations under the European Convention on Human Rights as expressed in the judgment of 9 January 2003 of the European Court of Human Rights in the case of L and V v. Austria concerning the homosexual and heterosexual ages of consent; and if he will make a statement. [190166]

Mr. MacShane: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to him on 13 May 2003, Official Report, column 161W. I have had no recent discussions with the Gibraltar Government on this issue.

Guatemala

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the Government of Guatemala about the scale of violence against women in that country. [190190]

Mr. Rammell: We are concerned at the high levels of violence committed against women in Guatemala. Unfortunately this is part of a much wider human rights problem in Guatemala, which I raised with the new Vice-President when I visited Guatemala in January. However, we have noted the positive efforts that President Berger has made since his inauguration on 14 January to improve human rights generally in Guatemala.

Our ambassador to Guatemala and other EU ambassadors raised concerns about increasing levels of violence and murders of women with both the Attorney-General and the Minister of Home Affairs in August. Yakin Erturk, UN special rapporteur on violence against women, raised similar concerns on her visit to Guatemala in February. The UK chargé d'affaires and other EU ambassadors also attended a meeting with Susana Villaran, OAS rapporteur on violence against women and Frank la Rue, Head of the Guatemalan Presidential Commission on Human Rights. Mr. La Rue acknowledged the concerns expressed by the UK chargé and other ambassadors about increasing attacks on women and said the Guatemalan Government took very seriously the issues raised by the UN and OAS rapporteurs.

We will continue to monitor human rights closely.

Haiti

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the interim Government of Haiti regarding the security situation in Port-au-Prince. [189681]

Mr. Rammell: The security situation in Haiti remains volatile. But, due to the efforts of the UN multinational force and the interim Government, there has been some improvement since the political crisis in February, which led to former President Aristide's resignation and departure.

We have no direct representation in Port-au-Prince— we cover Haiti from the British Embassy in Santo Domingo. Our Ambassador there has made regular trips to Haiti over the past 18 months, most recently visiting Port-au-Prince in August 2004, when he discussed the security situation with the Prime Minister.

Hurricane Ivan

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many UK holiday makers and UK citizens resident in (a) Grenada, (b) Jamaica and (c) Cuba were airlifted out of those countries (i) in advance of and (ii) subsequent to Hurricane Ivan. [189908]

Mr. Mullin: No British holidaymakers or citizens were airlifted out of Grenada in advance of Hurricane Ivan as there was insufficient warning of its impact. In the days immediately following the hurricane, the British High Commission in Grenada assisted approximately 400 British tourists, EU and Commonwealth nationals to secure flights, including one we chartered, out of Grenada, principally via Barbados. A further 200 British visitors, residents and dual British/Grenadian citizens have since been advised about leaving Grenada. Since 13 September commercial flights, principally via Barbados on regional airlines, have been operating out of Grenada.

We understand from British tour operators with clients in the region that before the hurricane there were around 3,400 holidaymakers. Just under half of these left the island before the hurricane struck. A significant number of those who remained were visiting friends and relatives and could not be contacted. Subsequently, 131 were moved to another part of Jamaica and 2,497 were evacuated to another island or returned to the UK.

We understand there were about 5,500 holidaymakers booked through British tour operators on Cuba. Approximately 1,000 were evacuated to an alternative holiday destination, the remainder were moved to other parts of the island.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance is being provided by his Department to governments of islands affected by Hurricane Ivan. [190274]

Mr. Rammell: For information about UK assistance following Hurricane Ivan I refer my right hon. Friend to the statement my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development made to the House on 14 September 2004, Official Report, columns 1125–27, which was updated on 16 September 2004, Official Report, columns 169–72WS. A further written statement, updating the House on UK assistance following Hurricanes Ivan and Jeanne, was issued on 12 October 2004, Official Report, columns 14–20WS.

Hurricane Ivan hit Grenada on 7 September causing severe damage and destruction as well as loss of life. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has appointed my noble Friend the Baroness Howells of St. Davids as his Personal Envoy to Grenada. She travelled to Barbados and Grenada from 21 to 24 September with representatives of the Department for International Development and the British High Commissioner to Barbados and the Eastern Caribbean to see the situation at first hand. We look forward to discussing her recommendations.

In response to a request from the Prime Minister of Grenada, Dr. Keith Mitchell, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's Caribbean Regional Prisons Adviser, Nicholas Brooke, has travelled to Grenada to inspect the prison, which was badly damaged in the hurricane. He will assess the current state of the prison, make recommendations for short-term remedial action and report on the medium and long-term implications for the prison following the hurricane damage. We have also provided him with some funds for immediate work on the prison.

On 12 September Grand Cayman took an almost direct hit from Hurricane Ivan. We have funded police reinforcements from neighbouring Overseas Territories to be deployed, and provided part funding for a detachment from the Bermuda Regiment to assist with the clean up operation. We have also made available various technical advisers and reinforced the Governor's office.

Iran

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the outcome was of the International Atomic Energy Agency's board meeting held on 13 September with respect to Iran's nuclear programme; and if he will make a statement. [189940]

Mr. MacShane: The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) Board of Governors adopted a Resolution urging Iran to co-operate fully with the IAEA, to implement fully its Nuclear Safeguards Agreement and to clarify all outstanding questions regarding its nuclear programme. The Resolution also regrets that Iran has reversed its decision to suspend the enrichment of uranium. The Resolution goes on to request that the Director-General of the IAEA present a further report on progress in advance of the next meeting of the Board of Governors in November, at which time the Board will again consider what further steps to take in order to persuade Iran to abide by its obligations under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

The Resolution was adopted by consensus on 18 September. The full text of the Resolution, and the Director-General's report which informed the Board's discussions, is available on the IAEA internet website, www.iaea.org.

Iraq

Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will request a full report from the US Government on the alleged attack by US helicopters on unarmed Iraqi civilians on Sunday 12 September in Haifa Street, Baghdad. [189741]

Mr. Rammell: We are aware of reports of civilian casualties as a result of this incident. The US authorities are currently undertaking an investigation. We understand that a US armoured vehicle came under attack. During evacuation of the vehicle's crew, US personnel were injured and helicopter support was requested.

Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will request the Iraqi Interim Government to conduct an inquiry into the alleged attack by US helicopters on unarmed Iraqi civilians on Sunday 12 September in Haifa Street, Baghdad. [189742]

Mr. Rammell: We are aware of reports of civilian casualties as a result of this incident. We do not intend to request the Iraqi Interim Government to conduct an inquiry as the US authorities are currently undertaking an investigation. We understand that a US armoured vehicle came under attack. During evacuation of the vehicle's crew, US personnel were injured and helicopter support was requested.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Lynne Jones) of 13 September 2004, Official Report, column 1454W, who authorised UNMOVIC and the International Atomic Energy Agency to excise parts of the Iraqi declaration of December 2002; which categories of information were removed; how many pages the excised sections comprise; and whether it was accepted by all UN Security Council non-permanent members that they should receive only an excised version of the Iraqi declaration. [189770]

Mr. MacShane: The decision to excise parts of Iraq's declaration was made by UNMOVIC and the International Atomic Energy Agency, and agreed by the UN Security Council. The excised portion contained information about Iraq's nuclear weapons programme which could potentially be of benefit to non-nuclear weapons states seeking to pursue nuclear weapons programmes. It is not possible to say precisely how many pages of text were excised since the formatting of the excised version was different from that of the original. No member of the Security Council at the time raised any objection to receiving only the excised version of the declaration.

Israel

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Israeli Government about the treatment of Palestinian prisoners. [189694]

Mr. Rammell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) on 9 September 2004, Official Report, column 1372W. On 2 September the Israeli Prison Service informed our embassy in Tel Aviv that the hunger strike had ended.

We continue to monitor the situation with regard to Israeli treatment of Palestinian prisoners and raise our concerns with the Israeli authorities.

Kosovo

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the forthcoming elections in Kosovo on 23 October. [189885]

Mr. MacShane: On 23 October the people of Kosovo will go to the polls to elect the Assembly of Kosovo for a second term of office. A total of 33 political entities have successfully registered for the elections representing Kosovo Albanian, Kosovo Serb, Turk, Ashkali, Gorani, Roma and Bosniak communities. However only two Serb organisations have registered, with all others boycotting. We continue to urge the Serbian Government to encourage Kosovo Serb participation in the elections and welcome the support given by President Boris Tadic on 5 October for their participation.

Responsibility for ensuring the elections are conducted in a free and fair manner will be shared between the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) and the Central Election Commission Secretariat (CECS), a local body. The Council of Europe will provide international monitors to observe the elections. On 8 September, the Council of Europe reported that it was > 'largely satisfied with the progress made by electoral bodies in the preparation for the election'.

The full report can be found on the Council of Europe website: www.coe.int/Observation of the elections in Kosovo/Preliminary report CEEOM IV—2004

There are 120 seats in the Kosovo Assembly. 100 seats are distributed amongst all parties in proportion to the number of votes won. Ten seats are allocated to the parties, organisations, citizens' initiatives and independent candidates representing the Kosovo Serb community. The remaining ten seats are allocated to other minority communities. Further information on the Kosovo Assembly elections can be found at www.osce.org.

Poppy Cultivation

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions have taken place with the Governments of (a) Afghanistan and (b) Burma regarding (i) poppy cultivation and (ii) progress in controlling the cultivation of poppies since the removal of the Taliban. [189888]

Mr. Rammell: As lead nation on counter narcotics in Afghanistan since April 2002, the UK has had regular discussions and works closely with the Afghan Government to support delivery of the Afghan National Drug Control Strategy, which was adopted in May 2003. I have visited Afghanistan for discussions with President Karzai and his Ministers about progress on the strategy. The UK has allocated £70 million over three years to support this work. As a result of those contacts, in the first year of implementation of the strategy the basic counter narcotics structures have been put in place: drug control legislation, a Counter Narcotics Directorate, the Ministry of Interior's Afghan Special Narcotics Force, the Counter Narcotics Police and a central eradication capability. Work is also in hand to develop alternative livelihoods for farmers dependent on opium poppy cultivation. The measures we have put in place provide a sound basis for future co-operation with the Afghan Government and international partners to secure the further development of robust institutions and programmes to combat opium production and trafficking. Progress remains linked to the wider security situation in Afghanistan and to the implementation of other areas of institution building such as policing and judicial systems.

Burmese opiates are not trafficked to the UK in significant quantities. Most stays within the Asia/Pacific region. Our Ambassador in Rangoon discussed the reduction of poppy cultivation and other drugs issues with Burmese Ministers during a visit to Northern Shan State in January 2004.

Russia

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions his Department has had with Russia regarding the situation in (a) Chechnya and (b) Ingushetia. [182178]

Mr. Rammell: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has discussed the situation in the North Caucasus with his Russian counterpart, Sergei Lavrov, on several occasions since the tragic siege at Beslan in September. Most recently they discussed Chechnya on 22 September, when they met in New York. As in previous meetings, including those during the Foreign Secretary's visit to Moscow in July, they discussed international concerns about the human rights situation in Chechnya. They also discussed the difficult security situation in the region and the need for the United Kingdom and the Russian Federation to co-operate closely in the fight against terrorism.

I also raised the situation in the North Caucasus with the Russian Ambassador when I saw him recently. This followed my substantive discussions with senior Russian officials on this subject during my visit to Moscow on 6–7 April. During my discussions in Moscow, I specifically raised concerns over human rights abuses in Chechnya, and pressed too for progress on the political process there. In addition, I raised the situation in Ingushetia with regard to the conditions for internally displaced persons there.

These exchanges are part of our ongoing, regular dialogue with the Russian Federation on the situation in the North Caucasus.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Zimbabwe about the voter registration process in Zimbabwe. [189860]

Mr. Mullin: Zimbabwe and other members of the Southern African Development Community (SADC) recently adopted principles on democratic elections. These stipulate that all citizens should have equal opportunity to exercise the right to vote; that there should be no discrimination in voter registration; and that the voters' roll should be updated and accessible. We have made clear, including through the British Embassy in Harare and the European Union Presidency, that we look to Zimbabwe to fully respect these and other SADC principles.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Arthritis

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many rheumatoid arthritis sufferers are receiving treatment with (a) Embrel and (b) Remicade in Northern Ireland. [188534]

Angela Smith: Figures collected between June and July 2004 indicate that approximately 241 patients were being treated with anti-TNF medication; of these (a) 69 patients were prescribed Enbrel, (b) 102 were prescribed Remicade while a further 70 patients were prescribed another anti-TNF medication such as Adalimumab (Humira).

A small number of those treated with anti-TNF medication may not be rheumatoid arthritis sufferers.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many rheumatoid arthritis sufferers commenced treatment with (a) Embrel and (b) Remicade in each of the last 12 months in Northern Ireland. [188535]

Angela Smith: The information requested is not available centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many rheumatoid arthritis sufferers are waiting to commence anti-TNF medications in the Province. [188536]

Angela Smith: Figures collected between June and July 2004 indicate that approximately 427 persons are waiting for treatment with anti-TNF medication. All of these patients are currently receiving treatment with other medication.

A small number of those waiting for treatment with anti-TNF medication may not be rheumatoid arthritis sufferers.

Bovine TB

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his policy to combat bovine tuberculosis in Northern Ireland. [188247]

Mr. Pearson: My Department has in place a Tuberculosis (TB) control programme which aims to bring about a substantial reduction in TB disease levels in Northern Ireland. The control measures are based on a programme of testing, the slaughter of infected animals, the restriction of movements of animals to and from infected herds and surrounding herds, and the tracing of contact animals.

The implementation of the TB Policy Review measures which I announced at the beginning of September will ensure further progress towards the effective long-term control of the disease. The new measures being introduced this autumn include tighter restrictions on overdue TB tests and changes to the valuation system which mean that herdkeepers will in future pay for independent valuations, the independent valuer's valuation will no longer be final and binding, and an independent appeals panel is being established to review any disputed valuations.

Work is also under way on the feasibility of further measures that can be introduced to control TB. My Department is piloting the use of the gamma interferon blood test, in combination with skin testing, to assist in the detection of TB in cattle in certain circumstances. There is also ongoing work on research collaboration with the ROI.

In relation to badgers and TB, I have established a Stakeholder Group to review the badger studies that have been carried out in the ROI, along with research in badgers undertaken in NI, and all other relevant information available so far from the work in GB. I await the report of the Group to enable me to make a fully informed decision on the way ahead.

Chest Pain Clinics

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many rapid access chest pain clinics are operational in Northern Ireland; and if he will make disabled children a priority area for 2005–06. [190463]

Angela Smith: There are currently two rapid access chest pain clinics in Northern Ireland, which are based at the Royal Victoria and Belfast City Hospitals. Further clinics are expected to open shortly at the Mater and Craigavon Hospitals, and one is under consideration by Altnagelvin Hospital.

The prioritisation of children requiring cardiology or cardiac treatments is a clinical decision, based on the most clinically urgent receiving treatment first.

Domestic Violence

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what estimate he has made of the costs resulting from domestic violence in each of the last five years in Northern Ireland. [188530]

Angela Smith: The information requested is not available.

Research has recently been published which estimated the cost of domestic violence to society in England and Wales at £23 billion each year. £6 billion of this related to the direct costs of services to deal with domestic violence (police, criminal justice system, health and social services care, housing and civil legal cases) and to the loss of economic output due to the suffering of victims. There has been no similar research on costs in Northern Ireland. Extrapolation of the research figures for England and Wales on a pro-rata population basis would indicate that the cost of services and loss of economic output due to domestic violence could amount to about £180 million each year in Northern Ireland.

Early Release Scheme

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many prisoners were released under the Early Release Scheme under the Belfast Agreement; and how many of those released have been convicted of re-offending. [189794]

Mr. Pearson: To date (27 September 2004), 447 prisoners have been released early since the signing of the Good Friday Agreement under the terms of the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998. Details of those who have re-offended are only held for those who come to the attention of police whilst still under licence, of whom 28 have been convicted of further offences.

Flooding

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what emergency plans are in operation for dealing with flooding in Northern Ireland. [188738]

Mr. Pearson: The Department for Regional Development Roads and Water Services and Department of Agriculture and Rural Development's Rivers Agency are the key Agencies in Northern Ireland with a flooding response capability in association with other key stakeholders, mainly district councils, who also have roles to play.

Each Agency has its own emergency response arrangements. As a matter of course these arrangements provide for out-of-hours contact from the public and the mobilisation of staff, plant and equipment.

With regard to specific plans, Rivers Agency responds in accordance with its Flooding Emergency Arrangements, while Water Service responds in accordance with the Water Service's Major Incident Plan and Roads Service in accordance with the Roads Service Emergency Response Plan

In addition the Rivers Agency, Roads Service and Water Service have established a Joint Flood Strategy Steering Group to oversee co-ordination of their respective efforts in preventing, planning for and responding to flooding incidents. The Steering Group, which is chaired by the Rivers Agency, has developed a set of Best Practice Guidelines on an Integrated Response to Flooding.

Irish Language

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the cost of implementing an Irish language policy has been to each Government Department since its introduction. [187778]

Angela Smith: During devolution Northern Ireland Executive Ministers decided policy on the language to be used by each Department for letterheads and public advertisements, including the use of Irish and Ulster Scots. At an early stage during the current period of suspension, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, decided that the position within each Northern Ireland Department should remain unchanged. This remains his current assessment.

The costs incurred from 1998 until March 2004 as a result of these Irish language policies are as follows:

Department	Cost (£)
DHSSPS	367,266
DE	70,765
DEL	35,655
DFP	5,084
DCAL	26,886
DARD	388
DETI	285
OFMDFM	84,821
DOE	9,883
DRD	195
DSD	677
NIO	1,366

Jobskills Programme

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proportion of participants on the Jobskills programme moved into full-time employment in each of the last five years. [190422]

Mr. Gardiner: The Jobskills programme consists of three separate but integrated strands, each dealing with a particular client group:

the Access strand offers unemployed 16 and 17-year-olds training leading to approved qualifications up to National Vocational Qualification (NVQ) Level 1;

the Traineeship strand offers unemployed 16 and 17-year-olds training leading to the attainment of a NVQ Level 2; and the Modern Apprenticeship strand offers employed 16 to 24-year-olds training leading to the attainment of NVQ Level 3.

Trainees can progress from one strand to another and information on each strand is recorded separately.

In the case of the Access strand, progression within Jobskills is considered a positive progression which can ultimately lead to employment; therefore, the proportion of leavers moving to employment or progressing are both provided.

Percentage

	1999–2000	2000–01	2001–02	2002–03	2003–04
Access
Employment	18	17	19	16	17
Progression	32	31	31	36	7
Traineeship
Employment	63	64	65	64	31
Modern Apprenticeship	[1]—	[1]—	[1]—	[1]—	[1]—

[1] All trainees in the Modern Apprenticeship strand are required to be in employment as a condition of participation.

Training in the Access and Traineeship strands normally lasts 18 months. Consequently, 56 per cent. and 68 per cent. respectively of the 2003–04 cohort within these strands are still in training. It is, therefore, expected that the proportion moving into employment will subsequently increase.

Monkstown Young Citizen Volunteers

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what links have been identified between the Monkstown Young Citizen Volunteers (YCV) and the banned Ulster Volunteer Force (UVF); and what actions he will take to prevent the Monkstown YCV from promoting the UVF. [182914]

Mr. Pearson: The Young Citizen Volunteers was established in 1912 as the youth wing of the Ulster Volunteer Force. I understand that the Monkstown YCV is the local branch of the YCV. The response to any paramilitary display is a matter for the PSNI.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action he has taken to ascertain whether the flags and emblems associated with the Monkstown Young Citizen Volunteers constitute an illegal paramilitary display. [182915]

Mr. Pearson: The police have received no reports alleging that the Monkstown Young Citizen Volunteers has committed any offences with regard to flags and emblems during this year's marching season.

MOT Certificates

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how long it will take to clear the backlog of applications for MOT certificates in Northern Ireland due to the recent industrial dispute. [189608]

Angela Smith: The Driver and Vehicle Testing Agency expects to take up to 12 months to clear the backlog of MOT applications.

Planning Applications

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how long it will take to clear the backlog of planning applications in Northern Ireland caused by the recent industrial dispute. [189607]

Angela Smith: It is not possible to determine how long it will take to clear the backlog of applications. However, the Planning Service is committed to processing applications as quickly as possible.

Police Duties

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proportion of police officers in North Belfast have been assigned to neighbourhood or community duties. [189795]

Mr. Pearson: 15.1 per cent. of police officers in North Belfast DCU have been assigned to neighbourhood or community duties. In addition, 72 part-time reserve officers complement the work of the sector police.

Police Establishment

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proportion of the police establishment in North Belfast is made up of (a) full-time reserve officers and (b) part-time officers. [189793]

Mr. Pearson: The current police establishment in North Belfast is composed of:

(a) 18.5 per cent. full-time reserve officers;

(b) Part-time reserve officers complement the DCU strength. There are currently 72 part-time officers.

Scientific Officers (Promotion)

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what criteria are used by the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development's promotion boards for scientific officer positions to assess applications from persons (a) with a non-scientific background and (b) not currently working for the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development. [190382]

Mr. Pearson: The Department of Agriculture and Rural Development held a promotion board to interview candidates for promotion to the grade of Scientific Officer in April/May 2004. A circular advising of eligibility and self-nomination arrangements was issued to all NICS Departments inviting applications from eligible officers. This was the first promotion board to this grade to which eligibility was opened to analogous grades.

For this competition the eligibility criteria was restricted to (i) officers in the Assistant Scientific Officer grade and (ii) officers in analogous grades from other disciplines who met the current entry requirements for ASOs ie. 4 GCE/GCSE 'O Levels, grades A-C which must have included English Language, Mathematics and a Science subject. In addition, all staff self-nominating were required to have a current "fitted for promotion" or better assessment on their annual report.

The key selection criteria against which candidates were assessed for promotion by the board were as follows:

(a) Services

(b) Resources

(c) People

(d) Information/Communication

(e) Professional/Specialist/Technical Knowledge and Skills

Prospective applicants were advised in an addendum to the promotion board notice that the Professional/Specialist/Technical/Knowledge and Skills criterion related to the Biology, Chemistry and Microbiology disciplines and that they would be required to demonstrate both on the application form and at interview how they satisfied this criterion in the context of these scientific disciplines.

Special Advisers

Lembit Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many special advisers associated with each party that held seats on the suspended Northern Ireland Executive are paid from government funds; how much has been spent in each of the past 12 months on such advisers; what the rationale is for continuing the payments; and what the duties are of those advisers. [185630]

Mr. Spellar: Following the suspension of the Northern Ireland Assembly until May 2004, a total of seven special advisers have been paid from government funds. Special advisers are employed under two separate schemes. The DUP, Sinn Fein and UUP each employ one adviser under a scheme operated by the Northern Ireland Assembly. These advisers are employed by their parties to assist in the performance of their members' Assembly duties during suspension, working for a smooth return to devolved government and engaging in discussion for that purpose. The remaining four, two appointed by the former First Minister and two by the former Deputy First Minister, were employed as civil servants and attached to the Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister.

Following two resignations in June 2004, the latter group now comprises two advisers, employed to support the former First Minister and Deputy First Minister respectively during suspension, working for a smooth return to devolved government and engaging in discussion for that purpose.

Unlicensed Hire Vehicles

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people have been prosecuted in Northern Ireland for operating vehicles not licensed for hire or reward in the last five years. [189732]

Angela Smith: The Driver and Vehicle Testing Agency has primary responsibility for enforcing the regulations governing the use of vehicles for hire and reward within Northern Ireland. During the period April 1999 to March 2004 inclusive, a total of 629 operators were prosecuted for operating goods vehicles without being licensed to carry goods for hire and reward.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

Select Committees

Llew Smith: To ask the Leader of the House what proposals he has to increase public knowledge of the dates of sitting and subject of inquiries by Select Committees; and what proposals he has to facilitate public access to Select Committee hearings. [190141]

Mr. Hain: Considerable progress has been made in making information about Committee activity more readily accessible to the public. In particular, I commend the new forward calendar of Committee activity on the Parliament website and the Committee Office telephone information line. The live webcasting of all Committee hearings is also a very welcome development. However, I believe that more needs to be done to ensure that the information provided reaches a greater section of the public; and to this end I hope that the House of Commons Commission will give sympathetic consideration to the recommendations in the Modernisation Committee's recent report on Connecting Parliament with the Public.

The reception and security facility planned for Cromwell Green will facilitate public access to Select Committee hearings. I very much hope that the House will also support in due course plans for a Visitors' and Educational Centre, which would allow for live relay of Committee hearings, as well as proceedings in the Chamber.

CABINET OFFICE

Civil Service Pensions

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make it her policy to amend the pre-2002 Civil Service Pension Scheme to allow widows and widowers of civil servants who remarry or cohabit to retain their pension rights; and if she will make a statement. [190183]

Ruth Kelly: I have no plans to do so.

Until recently all public service pension schemes (and many in the private sector) only provided widows' and widowers' pensions up until the beneficiary remarries or cohabits with someone as their husband or wife. From October 2002, a new pension scheme for civil servants was introduced (known as premium) which has an improved benefit structure paid for by higher employee contributions. One of the improvements is to provide widows and widowers pensions for life. To provide a similar improvement in respect of the pre-October 2002 scheme (known as classic), where higher contributions have not been paid, would not only be unfair to the members of premium who are paying higher contributions for enhanced benefits, but would also result in tax payers meeting the additional costs to the classic scheme of doing so.

Public service-wide additional costs for future service have been estimated at £150 million per annum, plus a one off cost of £3 billion to cover all past service.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Cosmetics (Animal Testing)

Tom Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many European Union states have a ban on the use of animal testing for cosmetics; and if she will make a statement. [190251]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The UK has operated a voluntary ban on the testing of cosmetic products on animals since 1996. This ban was made compulsory on 11 September 2004, with the implementation of the Cosmetic Products (Safety) Regulations 2004 (SI 2004/2152), which implement the 7th Amendment to the EU Council Directive on the safety of cosmetic products.

All EU member states were required to implement the 7th Amendment by 11 September 2004. It imposes a ban on the testing of finished cosmetic products on animals from 11 March 2005.

Coal Mine Methane

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of the implications of (a) converting coal mine methane to energy and (b) venting coal mine methane; and if she will make a statement on support for coal mine methane-related technology. [190236]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government commissioned a study in 2003 to see if there are any possible mechanisms, consistent with the objectives of the Energy White Paper, which could be deployed to encourage the control of CMM emissions. This study was undertaken by independent consultants and was overseen by a Advisory Board of representatives from the industry, DTI, DEFRA, and the Coal Authority. The purpose of the exercise was to investigate means for controlling emissions to atmosphere from abandoned mines where the current practice of venting is clearly undesirable. The results of the study are available on the DTI's website at http://www.dti.gov.uk/energy/coal/cfft/coalminemethane.shtml.

The study included an assessment of commercially exploiting CMM for power generation or for use as a burner tip fuel. The consultants found that the least cost option for dealing with these methane emissions was through flaring rather than putting them to commercial use. It was also concluded that the potential capacity for power generation, beyond that already exploited by the industry, was limited at less than 20 MW. There was therefore no significant security of supply arguments for specifically encouraging electricity generation from CMM.

However, as a result of this study it was proposed that a scheme be established to control CMM emissions, which would be open to all technology options, including electricity generation, burner tip fuel use as well as flaring. Proposals from the private sector to control the emissions would be competitively considered by the Coal Authority and the most cost-effective solution awarded a contract leaving them to decide on the most cost-effective means of control.

The Government recognise and value the benefits the coal mine methane technology industry provides by tapping the methane emissions from disused coal mines and putting them to good use for generation of electricity. We have already demonstrated this support through our securing exemption from the climate change levy for electricity generated from CMM which came into force in November 2003, and why the proposed grant-scheme will be open to this technology.

Combined Heat and Power

Richard Younger-Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when she will publish the Combined Heat and Power Potential Study that is listed on the Sustainable Energy Policy Network's website. [187583]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The "Study on the economic potential for Combined Heat and Power" was published by Defra on 22 September. It can be found on the Defra website under Environmental Protection and then under Energy: Sustainable Energy.

Doorstep Cold Calling

Mr. Truswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what action her Department is taking to combat doorstep crime; and if she will make a statement; [190131]

(2) what steps she is taking to achieve a cross-departmental approach to combat crime and unscrupulous trading associated with doorstep cold calling. [190130]

Mr. Sutcliffe: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given on 16 September 2004, Official Report, column 1719W.

Pharmaceutical Industry Competitiveness Task Force

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will list the (a) membership, (b) start date and (c) purpose of the Pharmaceutical Industry Competitiveness Task Force; and how much has been allocated to this body by her Department. [188059]

Ms Rosie Winterton: I have been asked to reply.

The pharmaceutical industry competitiveness task force was established in March 2000 and reported to my right hon. Friend, the Prime Minister, in March 2001. A copy of the final report is available in the Library. Its aims were to ensure that the right strategies were in place to allow industry to contribute fully to the economy and bring safe, effective medicines to the British market.

The membership of the task force was:

Co-chairmen
Lord Hunt of Kings Heath	Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Health
Sir Tom McKillop	AstraZeneca
Members
1. Government
Lord Sainsbury of Turville	Minister for Science and Innovation
Baroness Blackstone	Minister of State for Education and Employment
Nick Raynsford MP	Minister for Housing and Planning
Stephen Timms MP	Financial Secretary to Her Majesty's Treasury
Sir Nigel Crisp	Permanent Secretary and Chief Executive, Department of Health
2. Industry
Sir Richard Sykes	Glaxo Welcome
J-P Garnier	SmithKline Beecham
Bill Fullagar	ABPI President, and Novartis
Vincent Lawton	APG Chairman, and Merck Sharp and Dohme
Trevor Jones	ABPI Director General

The Department did not allocate any funding to the task force. Jointly with industry, it provided the secretariat to the task force.

Plutonium

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the BNFL ships contracted to transport weapons grade plutonium from Charleston to Cherbourg (a) leave Charleston and (b) arrive at Cherbourg; and if she will make a statement. [190096]

Mr. Mike O'Brien [holding answer 11 October 2004]: The PNTL ships involved in the shipment departed from Charleston USA on 20 September.

The commercial shipment of plutonium between the United States and France using British registered PNTL ships is a matter between the countries and organizations involved. The Office for Civil Nuclear Security (OCNS) has approved the security plan for the voyage while the ships are in international waters. We are told that these plans take full account of all relevant international standards and obligations regarding the carriage of nuclear material. We will not comment on the detail of these plans, including the arrival date at Cherbourg, which may obviously be of use to terrorists.

Temporary Agency Workers Directive

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what changes have been made in her Department's position on the Temporary Agency Workers Directive since July this year; [189810]

(2) what her Department's position is on the proposal for a six week qualifying period for full employment rights in the Temporary Agency Workers Directive. [189811]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The UK position remains the same in that we are supportive of the principles of the directive but that the text needs to be changed to reflect the concerns of member states.

At the Employment, Social Policy, Health and Consumer Affairs Council in Luxembourg on 4 October 2004 I made it clear that the UK Government want to make progress on the directive and called upon others to join us in offering the presidency support in finding a way forward. But it was clear that many member states have difficulties with the text, including those provisions that relate to a qualifying period of six weeks. We need to find a solution that reflects the differing labour markets across the EU.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Data Protection

Mr. Gray: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs whether he has received a formal notice from Commissioner Bolkestein about the conformity of the Data Protection Act 1998 with the European data protection directive. [190101]

Mr. Leslie: Yes.

Information and Communication Specialists

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs how many information and communication technology specialists there are in full-time employment in the Department. [189580]

Mr. Lammy: There are 167 information and communication technology specialists in full-time employment in the Department for Constitutional Affairs.

DEFENCE

Afghanistan

Tom Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the cost to the Government of operations in Afghanistan has been to date; and if he will make a statement. [190245]

Mr. Ingram: Information on the costs of operations is included in the Ministry of Defence's published accounts for each year. The specific figures for Afghanistan, including both operating and Capital spend, are:

	£ million
2001–02	222
2002–03	311
2003–04	36
Total	569

It is too early as yet to provide a firm estimate for the costs in 2004–05.

Tom Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British military personnel were stationed in Afghanistan on 1 October. [190246]

Mr. Ingram: As at 1 October there were approximately 1,000 members of the British Armed Forces in Afghanistan.

Army Boards of Inquiry

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what rules govern the attendance of (a) independent observers, (b) family and legal representatives of the deceased and (c) accredited members of the press at Army boards of inquiry into a death; and what the boundaries of their participation are before, during and after each inquiry. [190201]

Mr. Ingram: Queen's Regulations for the Army states that no member of the public or the press has a right to be present at a Board of Inquiry.

The nominated next of kin may be given the opportunity to submit questions to the Board of Inquiry convening authority for consideration in the Terms of Reference.

It is the Army's practice to provide the next of kin with the Opinions, Findings and Recommendations of the Board and to offer them the option of receiving a copy of the full Board of Inquiry report should they wish to see it.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many independent observers have attended an Army Board of Inquiry into the circumstances of a fatal incident in each of the past five years; [190202]

(2) in those instances where independent observers have attended an Army Board of Inquiry into the circumstances of a fatal incident, (a) at what rank the invitation was issued, (b) what reason was given for the invitation and (c) what the nature of their participation was; [190204]

(3) in what circumstances an independent observer to an Army Board of Inquiry into the circumstances of a fatal incident may be asked to comment on (a) procedural and (b) evidential matters. [190205]

Mr. Ingram: None.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence under what circumstances the Army is obliged to delay holding a board of inquiry into a fatal incident; what his estimate is of the number of boards of inquiries that are pending; and if he will (a) list those instances in Great Britain where the delay has exceeded five years and (b) set out the reason for the delay in each case. [190263]

Mr. Ingram: Under no circumstances is the Army obliged to delay convening a Board of Inquiry (BOI). Since June 2004, a BOI must convene within 48 hours of an incident occurring. The Board must be adjourned if a criminal prosecution is likely and it cannot be reconvened until criminal proceedings have concluded.

There are currently 86 BOIs at various levels of completion. None has been delayed for more than five years.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the Queen's Regulations for army Boards of Inquiry are; and what regulations govern (a) the purpose of a Board of Inquiry, (b) the circumstances in which a Board of Inquiry may be established, (c) who is eligible to serve on a Board of Inquiry and what ranks the members may hold and (d) the time limit between the events which give rise to a board being established and its establishment. [190264]

Mr. Ingram: Guidance on the convening and conduct of inquiries is contained within The Queen's Regulations for the Army, Annex A to Chapter 5, in conjunction with the provisions of the Army Act 1955; Boards of Inquiry (Army) Rules 1956; and Regimental Inquiry Regulations 1956.

The purpose of any Service Board of Inquiry (BOI) into an incident is to ascertain what went wrong and why, in order to prevent a recurrence. It is not to apportion blame. A BOI may be established for any unnatural death or serious injury, or any other matter which the Convening Authority considers should be investigated.

The President will be an officer not below the rank of Captain. There will be a minimum of two other officers, each of whom will be either an officer or warrant officer, or a person not subject to military law but who is in the service of the Crown.

Boards are now convened within 48 hours of an incident occurring.

Chinook HC1 Helicopter

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the airworthiness review of the Chinook HC1 helicopter was conducted; and if he will place a copy in the Library. [189789]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 12 October 2004]: The Chinook HC1 Airworthiness Review was completed in August 1992 as part of an internal audit process. The review formed the first part of a process designed to address the integrity of the RAF's management of airworthiness and maintenance practices for the Chinook. I will place a copy of the review in the Library of the House.

Departmental Records Office

John McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what mechanism he has put in place to monitor the performance of TNT at the former Departmental Records Office, Bourne Avenue, Hayes; and what system is in place to receive and record complaints about performance. [173659]

Mr. Caplin: The Ministry of Defence has set up a Contract Management Team (CMT) to monitor the services provided by TNT to all the Departments involved at the former Departmental Records Office.

Departments should notify the CMT in writing of any TNT performance complaints. Each complaint is logged and passed to the TNT Customer Service Helpdesk Supervisor. TNT investigate the complaint and report back to the concerned department and the CMT with their findings, including a full resolution and/or process change requirement. The CMT reviews all outstanding complaints with the TNT Customer Service Supervisor daily, and monitors their progress until a successful resolution is determined. Once a resolution has been communicated to the relevant Department, the CMT follows up the resolution to ensure a satisfactory conclusion.

In addition to the processes mentioned above, the CMT and representatives of the TNT Management Team hold monthly update meetings with all departments involved to discuss TNT's service performance.

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 14 October 2004

DEFENCE

Departmental Records Office

John McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many complaints from former staff of his Department employed by TNT have been raised with regard to the new process for handling departmental records and their security. [173660]

Mr. Caplin: The Ministry of Defence Contract Management Team (CMT) has received a very small number of verbal criticisms concerning TNT's new processes for handling departmental records and their security from former MOD staff now employed by TNT. To facilitate investigation, written confirmation of the complaints was requested. None has yet been received.

Future Rapid Effects System

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what role he expects Galileo to play in providing the Future Rapid Effects System requirements with optimum battlespace awareness. [190058]

Mr. Ingram: Galileo is intended to be a civilian system under civil control. The Department expects the GPS military code to continue to meet defence requirements for a robust, secure satellite navigation system. Accordingly, there are no plans for the use of Galileo by the MOD's Future Rapid Effects System.

Information and Communication Specialists

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many information and communication technology specialists are in full-time employment in the Department. [189582]

Mr. Caplin: The information requested is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Iraq

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what screening tests have been established for (a) British troops, (b) British medical auxiliaries and (c) Iraqi civilians to assess the degree of inhalation and ingestion of depleted uranium dust during the military action in Iraq in (i) the Gulf war in 1991 and (ii) Operation Telic in Iraq in 2003; what resources have been committed to this testing; and if he will make a statement. [190206]

Mr. Caplin: On 22 September 2004, the independent Depleted Uranium Oversight Board (DUOB) announced the establishment of a retrospective testing programme for the analysis of uranium isotopes in urine and, if Depleted Uranium (DU) is found to be present, how much. The test is available free of charge to eligible individuals, including medical staff, who served in the Gulf area between 1 August 1990 and 31 July 1991 or in the former Republic of Yugoslavia on or after 5 August 1994. The total cost of the testing programme will depend on demand but is expected to be in the order of £1 million.

This retrospective test is entirely separate from MOD's own Biological Monitoring policy, under which all UK military personnel returning from theatres where DU munitions have been used—including Operation Telic—are offered a test for uranium in their urine. So far over 350 individuals have taken up this offer and have been tested. Of those, only a small number have been found to be excreting DU in their urine. These are personnel who were injured in accidental attacks by friendly forces and have embedded shrapnel. The cost to date of this programme is estimated to be £250,000. There will be a further annual staff cost of £25,000 for the duration of the project.

Assessing the degree of inhalation and ingestion of DU dust arising from the military action in Iraq among Iraqi civilians is a matter for the Iraqi Interim Government. Nevertheless, the MOD would offer advice if requested.

Land Use Payments

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the total amount was paid in each of the past three years to farmers and other landowners for the use of their land by his Department. [190278]

Mr. Ingram: I assume my hon. Friend is referring to the total amount paid by the Ministry of Defence to farmers and other landowners for the use of their land in respect of military training. In the last three years this has amounted to approximately £1.7 million per annum. This figure includes the costs of: the leasing of land outside of Army Training Estate (ATE) boundaries; the long term leasing of land within ATE boundaries; the purchasing of necessary Commoners Rights; and the use of other facilities such as safety buoys and electric/ water cables.

Military Equipment Sales

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the occasions on which armed forces personnel have attended as part of their duties promotional events for UK military equipment sales in each year since 2000–01. [184731]

Mr. Ingram: Military personnel attend a wide range of promotional events, as required as part of their duties. Such events may include UK and overseas defence exhibitions as well as equipment demonstrations and displays. Information concerning the attendance of military personnel at promotional events is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Op-telic Tender

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many garments have been delivered for the Op-telic Tender DC2 ESL/3122. [190858]

Mr. Ingram: Deliveries under this contract are due to be completed by January 2005 and the supplier has completed the first batch of 2,500 garments. We expect to receive samples of this batch before the first delivery in early November 2004.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment has been made of whether the fabric supplied for the Op-telic tender DC2 ESL/3122 meets the specification. [190859]

Mr. Ingram: The supplier for this contract has an obligation to deliver items which meet our specification. The Ministry of Defence quality surveillance methods include sample testing to ensure fabric is compliant. There are no concerns about the fabric used. Samples provided to date have met our specification.

RAF Kinloss

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) why the hon. Member for Moray was not informed of the impending announcement concerning the airfield review and RAF Kinloss prior to the release of a press statement; [191359]

(2) which media were informed, and when, about an impending announcement concerning the airfield review and RAF Kinloss prior to the letter sent to the honourable Member for Moray on 12 October. [191358]

Mr. Ingram: The Defence Airfield Review was announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 21 July 2004, Official Report, column 348. I sent letters to a number of hon. Members early on 12 October, including the hon. Member for Moray, detailing how we would be conducting the review with regard to the airfields in their constituencies. Hon. Members were therefore notified before any statement to the press, the exception being the hon. Member for Moray whose published contact details were incorrect. That led to him being notified later than other hon. Members.

Sea Cadet Corps

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the number of adult volunteers to the Sea Cadet Corps. [191661]

Mr. Caplin: Statistics for the Sea Cadet Corps are compiled once a year. As at 31 March 2004 there were 4,307 adult volunteers to the Sea Cadet Corps, comprising uniformed and non-uniformed instructors and chaplains, all of whom are civilians.

Warships

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to send HMS Victorious to a location other than Plymouth for its refit; and if he will make a statement. [190189]

Mr. Ingram: There are no plans to refit HMS Victorious at a location other than Plymouth. It is our policy to refit warships in the United Kingdom and Devonport Dockyard has the only facilities capable of refitting and refuelling RN nuclear-powered submarines.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Lottery Grants

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will make a statement on the policy of the National Lottery towards making grants conditional upon the procurement of only certified timber. [190750]

Estelle Morris: Lottery distributors are, and are intended to be, independent of Government, but they are obliged to take into account policy directions from the Secretary of State. These directions set out the framework for the wider aims of Lottery funding, and include the need for the distributing bodies to further the objectives of sustainable development when awarding Lottery grants. The Lottery distributing bodies are strongly committed to sustainable development, including the procurement of timber from legal and sustainable sources.

Renaissance in the Regions

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps her Department is taking to support the Renaissance in the Regions programme in Yorkshire. [190450]

Estelle Morris: The 2004 Spending Review White Paper sets out the intention of the Department to extend Renaissance in the Regions to all nine regional hubs. We face a number of difficult choices and competing priorities in allocating funding from the spending review but will do all we can to take the Renaissance initiative forward.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much funding from the Renaissance in the Regions programme (a) has been allocated and (b) will be allocated to Yorkshire. [190451]

Estelle Morris: The total allocations to the Yorkshire Regional Museum Hub under Spending Review 2002 are as follows:

2003–04	210,000
2004–05	676,000
2005–06	1,180,000

Allocations following the 2004 Spending Review will be made as soon as possible.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

False Alarm Emergency Calls

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many (a) genuine and (b) malicious false alarm fire emergency calls were received in Buckinghamshire in each year since 2001. [191054]

Mr. Raynsford: The number of fire false alarm calls attended by the Buckinghamshire fire and rescue service is as follows:

	(a) Genuine Good Intent	(a) Genuine Due to Apparatus	(b) Malicious
2001	1,611	2,435	459
2002	1,637	2,304	418
2003 (Provisional)	1,193	2,417	357

Note:

2002 and 2003 figures include estimates for fire false alarms not recorded during periods of industrial action.

Fire-related Deaths (Buckinghamshire)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many fire-related deaths in dwellings in Buckinghamshire there were in each year since 2001. [191053]

Mr. Raynsford: The number of deaths reported in dwelling fires attended by Buckinghamshire Fire and Rescue Service are as follows:

	Number
2001	3
2002	6
2003	[1]5

[1] Provisional figure.

High Hedges

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what progress he has made on reduction of the neighbour nuisance caused by high hedges; and if he will make a statement. [191145]

Phil Hope: The public consultation on implementing Part 8 of the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003, which gives local authorities the powers to deal with complaints about high hedges closed on 30 June. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is now finalising Regulations and guidance and expects the system to be fully operational around the end of 2004.

Parks

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if his Department will establish a programme to improve local parklands. [191455]

Phil Hope: The Government have already established programmes for improving local parks and green spaces. These are set out in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's reports "Living Places—Cleaner, Safer, Greener" (ODPM 2002), and "Sustainable communities: building for the future" (ODPM 2003). The initiatives they contain are currently being implemented through the cross-government "Cleaner, Safer, Greener Communities" programme.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Education Finance

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what funding streams are available to local education authority schools (a) directly from government and (b) through local education authorities, which are not available to city technology colleges and city academies. [190909]

Mr. Miliband: Schools maintained by local education authorities and city technology colleges and city academies are funded on similar terms on a like for like basis. However, the Standards Fund is used as a funding stream for schools maintained by local education authorities but not for schools of these types. However, the overall capital and revenue funding for city technology colleges and academies takes account of what comparable LEA schools would receive (including their Standards Fund allocations).

Adam Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what percentage of the UK's national income has been spent on education in each year since 1997 for which figures are available. [190665]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The percentage of the UK's Gross Domestic Product (GDP) spent on education since 1997 is as follows:

	Percentage
1997–98	4.5
1998–99	4.5
1999–2000	4.4
2000–01	4.6
2001–02	5.0
2002–03	5.1
2003–04	5.3
2004–05	5.4
2005–06	5.5
2006–07	5.5
2007–08	5.6

Note:

The figures for 2003–04 are based on estimated outturn and those for 2004–05 onwards are based on expenditure plans announced in the 2004 Budget Report.

Endometriosis

Mr. Cameron: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will take steps to ensure that information about endometriosis is routinely included in personal, social and health education in secondary schools. [190462]

Mr. Stephen Twigg [holding answer 13 October 2004]: In Personal, Social and Health Education (PSHE) lessons pupils are taught about sexually transmitted diseases including HIV/AIDS, how to seek professional advice on health related issues confidently, and ways of finding sources of help and information. However, we have no plans to include endometriosis routinely in PSHE lessons in secondary schools, although the condition might be raised in class discussions.

In statutory Science lessons, at Key Stage 3 (ages 11–14) pupils are taught about the human reproductive system and the menstrual cycle. At Key Stage 4 (ages 14–16) pupils learn about ways in which hormonal control occurs, including the effects of sex hormones. This would include conditions such as endometriosis which can affect fertility and the reproductive system in general.

Information and Communication Technology

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) what the amount is (a) in total and (b) per pupil spent on information and communication technology in maintained schools since 2001–02, broken down by local education authority in England; [189847]

(2) what the amount is (a) in total and (b) per pupil spent on information and communication technology in (i) primary and (ii) secondary schools in England since 2001–02. [189848]

Mr. Miliband: The information requested is not available centrally. Figures for England, derived from a sample of schools, are shown in the table. Figures at sub-national level are not available as the sample was not large enough to provide reliable estimates.

The latest information on total ICT expenditure and expenditure per pupil in maintained schools was published in Statistical Bulletin 'Survey of Information and Communications Technology in Schools 2003', which is available on the Department's website www.dfes.gov.uk/rsgateway.

For 2003–04, provisional estimates on ICT expenditure per school were published in a Statistical First Release (27/2004) on 29 July, a copy of which is also available on the Department's website. For the purposes of completeness, these figures are also shown in the table.

Resources for Children and Learners

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to the written ministerial statement of 16 September 2004, Official Report, columns 153–54WS, on Resources for Children and Learners what proportion of the extra funding announced for the next spending review period has been allocated to (a) early years, (b) primary schools, (c) secondary schools, (d) school sixth forms, (e) further education and (f) higher education. [191816]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The written statement I gave to the House on 16 September gave high level allocations across my Department's responsibilities. There are still some further considerations required at individual programme level before all allocations are finalised. Once these considerations are concluded we will present the detailed allocations to Parliament in the Departmental Annual Report.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

BSE

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs in which other countries cases of BSE have been verified; and how many cases were reported (a) in the EU and (b) in the USA between 2000 and 2004. [189628]

Mr. Bradshaw: The Office International des Epizooties (OIE) website shows that the following countries have verified cases of BSE which have been reported:

Austria
Belgium
Canada
Czech Republic
Denmark
Finland
France
Germany
Greece
Ireland
Israel
Italy
Japan
Liechtenstein
Luxembourg
Netherlands
Poland
Portugal
Slovakia
Slovenia
Spain
Switzerland
United Kingdom

(a) The number of cases of BSE reported in the EU between 2000 and 2004 was 8,319 (the data for 2004 is available only up to July for a few countries); (b) while one case of BSE was diagnosed in the USA in 2003 it was confirmed as having been imported from Canada.

BSE statistics worldwide can be found on the OIE website address at: http://www.oie.int/eng/info/en_esbmonde.htm

Executive Agencies

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will list the salaries of the Chief Executive of each agency which falls under her Department. [189614]

Alun Michael: Salaries of Defra's agency Chief Executives are published in each agency's annual report and accounts, which are presented to Parliament each year and placed in the Library of the House.

Farm Incomes (Buckingham)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on recent trends in farm incomes in the Buckingham constituency. [189856]

Alun Michael: Data on farm incomes at constituency level are not available at constituency level. Figures for the Government Office Region for the South East (including London) are shown in the table. Information on farm incomes for 2003–04 will be published in early December.

Net farm incomes for farms greater than eight ESU in south-east GOR (incl. London)

Farm Subsidies

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the start date is for single farm payments. [190374]

Alun Michael: The Single Payment Scheme will start on 1 January 2005. The European Regulations require 2005 payments to be made between 1 December 2005 and 30 June 2006. Our objective is to make payments as promptly as possible within that period.

Fisheries

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans she has for the future management of the (a) six and (b) 12-mile fishing zones around the UK coast; and whether regulation will impact upon UK and non-UK vessels uniformly. [190105]

Mr. Bradshaw: Under the CFP only UK vessels can fish within six miles of our coast and only vessels with historic rights can fish in the six to 12 mile zone. The reformed CFP enables member states to take conservation measures applying to all vessels. We are currently considering the future of inshore fisheries management as part of the response to the Prime Minister's Strategy Unit Report "Net Benefits: A Sustainable and Profitable Future to UK Fishing".

Foot and Mouth

Mr. Boris Johnson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs whether footage of the video taken by Northumberland Trading Standards on 23 February 2001 of the conditions on Burnside Farm was submitted to the Anderson Lessons Learned Inquiry. [190218]

Mr. Bradshaw: Defra has no record of the video, taken by an official of the Northumberland Trading Standards Department, of the conditions at Burnside Farm, run by Mr. Bobby Waugh, being submitted to the Anderson Lessons Learned Inquiry. The video was shown at Mr. Waugh's trial for breach of his waste food feeding licence which was held in May 2002.

The Anderson Inquiry was given and published a full investigation of the causes of the outbreaks of foot and mouth in 2001 and also saw records of the State Veterinary Service visits to the farm. The video contains no new information.

Information and Communication Technology

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many information and communication technology specialists are in full-time employment in the Department. [189584]

Alun Michael: The situation in Defra has changed recently and it may assist if I explain the background. A review of the Better Quality Services Programme for Defra IT was undertaken in 2001. This review concluded that Defra IT services should be outsourced, with some functions and strategic control remaining in Defra. IBM has been selected to run IT Services for Defra and the service commenced on 1 October 2004. Staff undertaking roles that were within the scope of the outsource transferred to IBM under the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981.

Ten full-time ICT specialists remain with the Department in the Intelligent Customer Function while 255 full-time ICT specialists were categorised as being in scope for outsourcing and are now employed by IBM.

Over-30 Month Cattle Scheme

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the saving would be of moving the over-30 month scheme to (a) over 36 months and (b) over 48 months. [189619]

Alun Michael: The approximate savings that would have been made from the year commencing 1 July 2003 of moving the over-30 month scheme to (a) over 36 months and (b) over 48 months are set out in the following table:

£ million

Costs[1]	(a) Over 36 months	(b) Over 48 months
Producer compensation payments	10.516	32.207
Carcase disposal	6.044	18.51
Total	16.56	50.717

[1] Based on current unit costs

Pet Animals Protection Convention

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans she has to sign the European Convention for the Protection of Pet Animals; and if she will make a statement. [190461]

Mr. Bradshaw: The Government plans to review the UK's position on signing the Council of Europe Convention on the Protection of Pet Animals once the Animal Welfare Bill is enacted.

Registered Holdings

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many registered holdings there are for European subsidy purposes; how many there were in 1994; and if she will make a statement. [188991]

Alun Michael: The number of holdings that registered/submitted applications for European subsidy purposes in 2004 and 1994, under the Integrated Administration and Control System are set out in the following table.

The figures for Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland were provided by their respective devolved assemblies.

	1994	2004
England	81,224	71,978
Wales	20,919	16,814
Scotland	25,542	19,675
Northern Ireland	28,748	24,944

Rural Payments Agency

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what factors underlay the decision to set the salary for the Chief Executive of the Rural Payments Agency at its present level. [189618]

Alun Michael: The Rural Payments Agency brought together functions from the former Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's regional centres and the former Intervention Board. The purpose was to streamline, modernise and reduce the costs of administering Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) schemes, while delivering a high-quality service to farmers and traders. This new agency required a leader with a successful track record of delivering radical change in a substantial delivery organisation and it demanded someone who could sustain a high level of performance. The Chief Executive post was therefore advertised in 2000 as an Open Competition. Since then there has been the additional challenge of delivering successful implementation of CAP reform. The external market and the high expectations of the post holder were factors in determining the salary. The salaries of chief executives are reported to Parliament in the usual way.

Sea Bass

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will liaise with other Departments to ensure that their catering policies source sea bass from hand line fisheries. [188137]

Mr. Bradshaw: Defra is compiling a catering services procurement toolkit that will include guidance on the relevance of fish sources to the Government's sustainable development objectives for food. This guidance will be published on Defra's website and central Departments will be notified directly.

The current draft does not refer to individual species of fish and nor does it suggest preferred catch methods but it does suggest that the method of catch should be labelled so that paying customers can make an informed choice when choosing dishes of food.

Defra supports the sourcing of sea bass from responsibly managed fisheries. Hand lining is a relatively low impact method of fishing and so can help fisheries to remain sustainable. Advice from the International Council for the Exploration of the Seas on sea bass has been that the level of exploitation of the stock appeared to be sustainable. New advice is due shortly which we will be considering carefully to ensure that this stock remains sustainably exploited. There are also currently no restrictions at a UK or community level on the method of fishing that can be used to target bass.

In these circumstances I consider it would be inappropriate to advise Departments to encourage their caterers to restrict the source of bass they purchase to hand line fisheries only.

Sugar

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what discussions she has had with sugar beet farmers from the Vale of York on the reform of the EU Sugar regime. [190373]

Alun Michael: Ministers and officials frequently meet farming organisations, including the National Farmers Union, to discuss a range of topical subjects including sugar reform. The current chairman of the NFU Sugar Board is a beet farmer from the Vale of York.

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the future of sugar beet farming in (a) the Vale of York and (b) England. [190379]

Alun Michael: The Government have consistently pressed for early and radical reform of the EU sugar regime, which is now seriously out of line with the decoupled, market-based approach already adopted for virtually all of the rest of the Common Agricultural Policy. The current regime also gives rise to major distortions in international trade, some of which are under active challenge in the WTO.

Negotiations are beginning in Brussels on a European Commission approach to reform which would mark a step change in the operation of the regime, bringing prices significantly closer to world levels and moving towards a more liberalised and competitive system based on comparative advantage rather than historic production and national self-sufficiency. We have welcomed this as an important step on the right direction.

We are in close touch with British Sugar, the National Farmers Union and a wide range of interests, both in the UK and elsewhere, who will be affected. The consultation exercise which we carried out on the Commission's original options paper last year will be followed by a further consultation once formal legislative proposals are tabled. We will also be providing Parliament with a full Regulatory Impact Assessment as soon as the detail is clearer. In addition we will shortly be publishing independent research on the economic, social and environmental implications in the UK of sugar reform. This should help to make clearer the likely impacts on sugar beet farming in the United Kingdom, as well as putting the reform into the wider context of decoupled support for agriculture.

Supermarkets Code of Practice

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what discussions on the Supermarkets Code of Practice she has had with (a) the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, (b) farming organisations, (c) supermarkets, (d) retailer representatives and (e) other relevant bodies. [190124]

Alun Michael: Responsibility for the Code of Practice rests with the Office of Fair Trading. However, as Defra is the sponsor Department for the farming and food industries, the subject of the Code will have arisen in the course of discussions and correspondence between Defra and representatives of various bodies, including farming and retail organisations. We have also discussed the Code with the Department of Trade and Industry and the Office of Fair Trading.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Correspondence

Sir Gerald Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will reply to the letter to him dated 21 July from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Mr. Farag Elkailani. [189707]

Mr. Blunkett: I replied to my right hon. Friend on 15 September 2004.

Identity Cards

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the (a) nature and (b) values are of his Department's consultancy contracts for, and in relation to, the identity card scheme. [188703]

Mr. Browne: There is one current Home Office consultancy contract in relation to the identity card scheme. PA Consulting Group were engaged in May 2004 as the Home Office's development partner providing resources in support of programme development.

Marriage (Denmark)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will commission research into the effects of legislation in Denmark which require that applicants and sponsors, for the purpose of marriage, from outside the EU must be aged over 24 years. [189391]

Mr. Browne: No. We are aware of the Danish requirement and we will be looking at reports on the effectiveness of this measure as a means of preventing marriage abuse. We are also keeping our own marriage provisions—including the extension of the probationary period, and the requirement for foreign nationals to give notice of their marriage at certain designated register offices under review and will make any changes to the Rules that we consider necessary.

TRANSPORT

Galileo Satellite

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will make a statement on the military implications for Galileo arising from the EU White Paper, "New Frontier for an Expanding Union" published in June; [190054]

(2) if he will make a statement on the military implications for Galileo arising from the meeting of the Council of the European Union's politico-military group on 8 September. [190075]

Mr. Jamieson: The Galileo satellite navigation system is being developed by the European Union and the European Space Agency as a civil project for transport and other non-military applications. It has been stated by successive Transport Councils that Galileo is a civil programme under civil control. A Joint Action of the Council has been agreed which enables referral of aspects of the Galileo programme that relate to the security of the European Union or its member states to an appropriate formulation of Council, i.e. Pillar II, where unanimity applies.

Driving Licences

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has held with European Union institutions about the standardisation of driving licences across the EU. [190806]

Mr. Jamieson: The European Commission published a proposal for a Third Directive on driving licensing on 5 December 2003. The Directive aims to promote free movement of citizens, improve road safety and increase the security of the driving licence system. My officials consulted fully and widely on these proposals during spring 2004. After detailed discussions in the Council Working Group, at which the European Commission was present, on 7 October the Transport Council reached a general approach on the Directive, which meets most of the Government's key objectives. The European Parliament is expected to complete its First Reading of the proposal in January 2005. I shall be writing shortly to the Chairmen of the Lords and Commons European Scrutiny Committees to bring them up to date on progress.

Pedestrian Walkways

Martin Linton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what powers are vested in (a) local authorities and (b) the police to prevent motorised vehicles from blocking pedestrian walkways. [190591]

Charlotte Atkins: Section 137 of the Highways Act 1980 makes it an offence to obstruct a highway without lawful authority. The pedestrian footway is part of a highway. The police may issue a fixed penalty notice for such obstruction. However, in London, by virtue of section 8 of the London Local Authorities and Transport for London Act 2003, authorised officers of borough councils and Transport for London are also empowered to issue a fixed penalty notice for the offence of obstruction under section 137 of the 1980 Act.

Section 15 of the Greater London (General Powers) Act 1974 makes it an offence to park a vehicle on footways and grass verges in London. This offence has been decriminalised under section 76 of the Road Traffic Act 1991 and, unless parking on the pavement has been specifically allowed at a particular location, London borough council parking attendants may issue a penalty charge notice where a vehicle is found parked on a pedestrian footway.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

BT

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to the answer of 28 April 2004, Official Report, column 1150W, on BT, if she will make a statement on the progress of the review of the rating system; whether she has received its initial findings; and when she expects the report to be published. [190703]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The independent rates review recommended by the Broadband Stakeholders Group (BSG) is currently at draft stage. The first draft was produced in the summer; a final draft is due at the end of October and it is expected that it will be presented to the Broadband Stakeholders Group in November.

Combined Heat and Power

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what factors governed the date of publication on the departmental website of the report by Cambridge Econometrics consultants on "Modelling Good Quality Combined Heat and Power Capacity To 2010: Revised Projections". [190798]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Cambridge Econometrics' report titled "Modelling Good Quality Combined Heat and Power Capacity to 2010: Revised Projections" was completed on 6 November 2003 and made available on DTI's website on 12 November 2003.

Entrepreneurship Education

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions she has had with the Department for Education and Skills to promote education in entrepreneurship in schools and colleges. [190837]

Jacqui Smith: My right hon. Friend has regular meetings with the Secretary of State for Education and Skills during which they discuss a wide range of issues, including enterprise education and work-related learning, which is now a statutory requirement in English secondary schools.

In this context our two Departments have been working closely to ensure that all young people are provided with a wide range of high quality, relevant, structured experiences of work that will develop enterprise capability, innovation, creativity, risk management and risk-taking. This is necessary to prepare young people for the world of work and to equip them with the enterprise and employability skills to meet employer and workplace demands as well as the ability to start and successfully run their own businesses.

That is why she welcomed the recommendations made by Sir Howard Davies in his Review of the Economy and Enterprise Education and the commitment made in the 2002 Budget to ensure that from 2005 all year 10 pupils will have the opportunity to experience five days enterprise learning, helping to develop the knowledge, skills and attitudes for enterprise capability, financial capability and economic and business understanding. The commitment also provides funding for Enterprise advisers to work with 1,000 secondary schools in deprived areas in order to give extra support to the enterprise education agenda.

Both DTI and DfES along with other government departments are supporting the UK's first Enterprise Week—Make Your Mark Campaign on 15–21 November 2004. It aims to inspire people in their teens and twenties to be enterprising, and to engage those who influence young people or provide services for them in a discussion about the importance of enterprise. Enterprise Week is co-ordinated by Enterprise Insight, which was founded by the UK's main business organisations working in partnership with leading enterprise development organisations.

Post Office

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what (a) representations she has received and (b) consultation has taken place with sub-post masters concerning the speed of the New Horizon computer system. [190285]

Mr. Sutcliffe [holding answer 13 October 2004]: None. Issues relating to the post office network computer system are operational matters for the company.

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many post offices have closed in Pembrokeshire since May 1997. [190899]

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am advised by Post Office Ltd. that data on post office closures by county or constituency is not available in the form requested, as the company does not require this data for operational purposes.

However it has produced quarterly statistics on post office closures by Government region/country since March 2000 and the net closure figures for Wales are:

Year to end March	Number
2001	68
2002	26
2003	18
2004	73
2005 (first quarter only)	45

Wind Energy

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to her answer of 14 September 2004, Official Report, column 1541W, on wind energy, what assessment she has made of the (a) impartiality and (b) objectivity of the study commissioned by the British Wind Energy Association. [189692]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: None. Though similar studies, including the one by S.W. White and G.L. Kulcinski at the University of Wisconsin, and detailed within the House of Lords Science and Technology Committee, 4th Report of Session 2003–2004, "Renewable Energy: Practicalities", show shorter payback periods for wind farms.

Women and Work Commission

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to her written statement of 11 October 2004, Official Report, columns 6–8WS, on the Women and Work Commission, what the proposed (a) resource budget and (b) departmental staff numbers to support the Women and Work Commission are; and if she will make a statement. [191855]

Jacqui Smith: The Women and Work Commission is an ad hoc advisory body of unpaid Commissioners who will report within a year. Support for the Commission will come from existing DTI/Women and Equality Unit resources.

(a) The projected resource budget is £300,000 of which £150,000 is projected administration costs and 150,000 is programme budget.

(b) The WWC Secretariat consists of three dedicated full time equivalent posts.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Benefits (East Lothian)

Anne Picking: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what the average minimum income guarantee payment is to pensioners in East Lothian constituency. [190146]

Malcolm Wicks: The minimum income guarantee was replaced by pension credit from 6 October 2003. The average pension credit award in East Lothian at 31 August 2004 was £36.54.

Anne Picking: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pensioners were in receipt of minimum income guarantee in East Lothian constituency at the last date on which it was paid. [190148]

Malcolm Wicks: As at 3 October 2003, there were 2,360 minimum income guarantee claimants in East Lothian parliamentary constituency. Pension credit replaced minimum income guarantee as at 6 October 2003.

Note:

Figures are rounded to the nearest 5.

Anne Picking: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pensioners are (a) eligible for and (b) in receipt of pension credit in East Lothian constituency. [190147]

Malcolm Wicks: Information on the number of people likely to be eligible for Pension Credit is not available at constituency level. However, we estimate that approximately 350,000 households in Scotland, corresponding to approximately 450,000 individuals (rounded to the nearest 50,000), are likely to be eligible for pension credit in 2004–05. Information on the number of pension credit recipients in Scotland and East Lothian is given in the table.

Pension credit recipients, 31 August 2004

	Households	Individuals
Scotland	271,900	325,355
East Lothian	3,635	4,400

Notes:

1. Figures are rounded to the nearest five

2. Individual recipients include a small number of partners under age 60

Occupational Pension Schemes

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many letters he has sent to occupational pension schemes in wind-up, in connection with his Financial Assistance Scheme, asking them to supply scheme data by 12 November; and if he will estimate the average cost to each scheme of providing the information requested. [190645]

Malcolm Wicks: Letters were sent to scheme trustees, administrators and actuaries through a number of professional bodies on behalf of the Department. The professional bodies who agreed to send these letters included the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority; the Association of Corporate Trustees; the Faculty and the Institute of Actuaries and the National Association of Pension Funds. They were advised to circulate the letter as widely as possible and it is also available on the Department's website.

The cost of providing the information requested will depend on the quality and availability of individual scheme records. The impact, if any, on scheme funds in providing this information, will depend on the extent to which those involved in administering the schemes are able to absorb any costs incurred rather than passing them on to scheme funds. The Government are still seeking industry contributions to the Financial Assistance Scheme and this is an opportunity for members of the pensions industry to provide one. We encouraged those involved to keep costs to a minimum.

Pension Credit

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many over-75s are claiming the guarantee credit element of the pension credit. [190644]

Malcolm Wicks: As at August 2004, the number of customers aged 75 and over claiming the guarantee credit element of pension credit was 1,081,430.

David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what review of the application process for receipt of the pension credit has been undertaken since the scheme was introduced. [190370]

Malcolm Wicks: The application process for pension credit has been designed to be straightforward for pensioners and their family and friends, who may apply on their behalf. The pension credit application line (freephone 0800 99 1234), which is the main method of applying, is working well and at the end of August had taken around 4.48 million calls since it became operational on 7 April 2003. The Pension Service is able to offer alternative ways of applying to suit individual circumstances. Independent research, a summary of which was placed in the Library in January, found high levels of customer satisfaction with the application line and with the application process overall. We have made minor improvements to the application process in the light of experience and will continue to do so, although there are no current plans for a fundamental review.

TREASURY

Gift Aid

14. John Barrett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he intends to announce the outcome of the consultation on his Department's plans to amend the Gift Aid rules on day memberships. [190550]

John Healey: Representatives of heritage and conservation charities have been involved in discussions about possible changes to the Gift Aid rules. We are considering carefully the points they and others have raised, and we will consider changes as part of the normal Budget process.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

15. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his policy is on using fiscal measures to encourage reduction in carbon dioxide emissions. [190551]

John Healey: The Government believe that well-designed economic instruments, alongside other policies, can play an important role in reducing CO_2 emissions. A number of measures have been introduced to help achieve this, including the Climate Change Levy, Company Car Tax reform and Enhanced Capital Allowances for energy-saving equipment. The Government will continue to explore options for using cost-effective economic instruments, including fiscal measures, to reduce CO_2 emissions, taking account of all social, economic and environmental objectives.

Science

17. Dr. Iddon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received on Government expenditure on science. [190553]

John Healey: The Government regularly receives representation on science spending.

Most recently, in developing the "Science and Innovation Investment Framework 2004–2014", published in July, the Department of Trade and Industry, the Department for Education and Skills and HM Treasury jointly undertook a wide-ranging consultation exercise, and received over 200 replies from individuals and organisations in academia, business, the charity sector, and from the regional and devolved Administrations.

National Insurance Fund

18. Paul Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his estimate is of the current surplus in the National Insurance Fund. [190555]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government Actuary estimates that the surplus in the National Insurance Fund will be £29.6 billion for 2004–05.

Red Diesel

19. Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to ensure that private pleasure craft will be able to use red diesel after 31 December 2006. [190556]

John Healey: Use of red diesel, which has an effective duty rate of 4.42 pence per litre, is permitted in private pleasure craft in the UK under a derogation from the European Energy Products Directive. This derogation is due to expire at the end of 2006 and we will be discussing it with other member states closer to that date, in the light of the views of stakeholders, including boat owners.

International Currency Transaction Tax

20. Mr. Barnes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has held with the Belgian Finance Minister about Belgium's support for an international currency transaction tax. [190557]

Mr. Timms: The Chancellor recently met with a range of finance Ministers, including the Belgian Finance Minister, at the Annual Meetings at which there was a discussion regarding an international currency transaction tax. The Government are open to exploring the full range of options for financing for development, and welcomes the recent reports of the French-Brazilian-Spanish-Chilean-UN and Landau working groups. The UK Government will continue to explore international taxes as potential long-term sources of development finance, but in the short-term the IFF remains the only workable proposal on the table to generate the resources urgently needed to help meet the MDGs.

Third World Poverty

21. Linda Gilroy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on UK investment in tackling poverty in developing countries. [190558]

Mr. Timms: The Government are making a considerable and increasing investment in tackling poverty in developing countries. As announced in the 2004 Spending Review, the budget of the Department for International Development (DFID) will grow by an average of 9.2 per cent. a year in real terms over the three years of the Spending Review period, to more than £5.3 billion a year by 2007–08. Total UK official development assistance will reach nearly £6.5 billion a year by 2007–08. This is equal to 0.47 per cent. of Gross National Income (GNI) and represents a real terms increase in UK ODA of 140 per cent. since 1997.

Millennium Development Goals 2015

22. Jim Knight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his Department's involvement in progress towards the 2015 Millennium Development Goals. [190559]

Mr. Timms: HM Treasury works very closely with the Department for International Development towards our shared objective of making progress towards the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs).

We share a Public Service Agreement Target on progress for poor countries through the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries initiative and on ensuring that our international partners work effectively towards meeting the MDGs.

We have massively increased aid since 1997 towards meeting the MDGs. Through Spending Review 2004, total UK Official Development Assistance (ODA) will reach nearly £6.5 billion a year by 2007–08, which represents a 73 per cent. real times increase in total UK ODA since 2001, and a 140 per cent. real terms increase since 1997.

We have been at the forefront of calls for additional debt relief, including the Chancellor's recent announcement that the UK will provide our share of up to 100 per cent. multilateral debt relief for the world's poorest countries.

And because we know that on current trends we will not meet the MDGs in 2015, we are calling for an International Finance Facility that would provide the additional funding needed immediately to make progress towards the MDGs.

Oil Price

23. Kevin Brennan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the macroeconomic implications of recent oil price fluctuations on the UK economy. [190560]

John Healey: The Government will publish updated forecasts for the UK and world economies in Pre-Budget Report 2004 as usual, taking into account all relevant factors and developments, including oil prices.

Tax/Pension Credits

24. Lynne Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with Cabinet colleagues regarding the (a) tax credit and (b) pension credit systems. [190561]

Dawn Primarolo: Tax credits have been hugely successful in their prime aims of tackling child poverty and making work pay.

John Thurso: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many new claims for tax credits have been received but not yet processed, broken down by region. [190164]

Dawn Primarolo: It is not possible to break down the number of claims for new tax credits that have been received but not yet processed by region. Over 150,000 new claims were received during September.

Hugh Bayley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much on average tax credits add to the income of a family with two children on a wage of (a) £10,000 and (b) £15,000 a year. [191226]

Dawn Primarolo: The figures requested are in the following table.

Family wage	Child tax credit	Working tax credit (not including childcare element)[1]	Total
10,000	3,803.30	1,935.35	5,738.65
15,000	3,803.30	85.35	3,888.65

[1] This Working Tax Credit award assumes that the families qualify for the premium available for working at least 30 hours a week.

These families may also qualify for up to £7,300 a year through the Childcare element of Working Tax Credit, which covers up to 70 per cent. of eligible childcare costs (subject to cost limits of £200 a week for families with two or more children).

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many people in Yeovil constituency were (a) overpaid and (b) underpaid tax credits in (i) 2002–03, (ii) 2003–04 and (iii) 2004–05 to date; and if he will make a statement; [191316]

(2) what his latest estimate is of the number of overpayments of (a) working tax credit and (b) child tax credit in (i) 2001–02, (ii) 2002–03, (iii) 2003–04 and (iv) 2004–05 to date; and if he will make a statement; [191774]

(3) what his estimate is of the tax credit (a) underpayments and (b) overpayments for each year from 2001–02 to 2004–05; and what proportion of underpayments for (i) 2002–03 and (ii) 2003–04 have now been paid in full to those entitled; [191778]

(4) what his latest estimate is of the total costs of (a) overpayments and (b) underpayments of tax credits for each year from 2001–02 to 2003–04; and if he will make a statement. [191792]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer the hon. Member to my answer to the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Andrew Turner) on 11 October 2004, Official Report, columns 81–82W.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many recipients of working tax credit have been refunded for underpayments in the last 12 months and subsequently told that the underpayment recalculations were wrong. [189432]

Dawn Primarolo: 6.1 million families are benefiting from one or both of the Child and Working Tax Credits. The treatment of overpayments arising from official error is described on page 8 of Code of Practice 26 "What happens if we have paid you too much tax credit?". Figures for the number of Working Tax Credit recipients affected are not available.

Capital Gains Tax

Ms Buck: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the annual revenue from capital gains tax if the exemption of owner occupied housing were removed. [191570]

Mr. Timms: The latest estimated costs of exempting gains arising on a disposal of a main or only residence were given in Chapter A of Budget 2004.

These costs are not the same as the yield from abolition of the relief, as consequential effects on the housing market would substantially reduce the yield. Reliable estimates of the yield from imposing capital gains tax at present rates on the disposal by individuals of their only or main residences are available only at disproportionate cost.

Employment (Glasgow)

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his estimate is of the total number of jobs located in the City of Glasgow; and what percentage of the total number of jobs in Scotland this figure represents. [190996]

Mr. Timms: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician, who has been asked to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. David Marshall, dated 14 October 2004:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about jobs located in the City of Glasgow. (190996)

In 2002, the latest year for which figures are available, there were 385,000 employee jobs located in the unitary authority of the City of Glasgow. This represented 17 per cent. of all employee jobs in Scotland.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Berry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether Inland Revenue information on incapacity benefit indicates to recipients that if their benefit dates from before 12 April 1995 the payments are free of income tax. [190903]

Dawn Primarolo: The Inland Revenue's leaflet IR144 "Income Tax and Incapacity Benefit" printed in May 2002 makes clear that a claimant's local Benefit Office, which is part of the Department for Work and Pensions, will advise if Incapacity Benefit is taxable or not. The SATax Return Guide refers to the tax treatment of Incapacity Benefit for those whose claim is for a period before 13 April 1995. It goes on to say that the Department of Work and Pensions (DWP) will provide a form showing whether the benefit is taxable.

International Finance Facility

Dr. Palmer: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress is being made with the International Finance Facility. [190554]

Mr. Boateng: Good progress has been made recently with the International Finance Facility. The World Bank's final paper on Aid Effectiveness and Financing Modalities found that the IFF was technically feasible and noted that the IFF was the most advanced proposal to frontline aid. Communiques from the meetings welcomed the Bank and Fund analysis of options to increase aid flows, such as the IFF, and looked forward to a further report on options to take these forward. Furthermore, all Nordic countries supported the IFF's potential róle in providing additional finance for development. The IFF will be central to the UK Presidencies of the G7 and EU in 2005.

Tom Brake: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to the oral answer from the Chancellor of the Exchequer of 17 June 2004, Official Report, column 895, on the International Finance Facility, if he will make a statement on the September reports by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund regarding the UK's proposal for the international finance facility. [190905]

Mr. Timms: Good progress was made on the International Finance Facility (IFF) at the Annual Meetings this year. The World Bank's final paper on Aid Effectiveness and Financing Modalities found that the IFF was technically feasible and noted that the IFF was the most advanced proposal to frontload aid. Communiqués from the meetings welcomed the Bank and Fund analysis of options to increase aid flows, using such mechanisms as the IFF, and looked forward to a further report on options to take these forward. The UK Government will be taking forward the proposal in 2005 when the IFF will be central to the UK Presidencies of the G7 and EU in 2005.

Lorry Road-user Charge Management Authority

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what the proposed functions of the Lorry Road-User Charge Management Authority are; [190646]

(2) what the proposed total costs are for setting up the Lorry Road-User Charge Management Authority in (a) 2004–05, (b) 2005–06, (c) 2006–07 and (d) 2007–08. [190651]

John Healey: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) on 12 October 2004, Official Report, column 243W. HM Customs and Excise's plans for the Lorry Road-User Charge (LRUC) include the setting up of an LRUC Management Authority (MA).

The Government set out the proposed functions of the MA in "Modernising the taxation of the haulage industry: lorry road-user charge—Progress report 3" in March 2004, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House. Since then Customs have been doing more work on the MA's functions, although final decisions about its scope and the timetable for the transition from a procurement programme to a Management Authority have yet to be taken.

Pensioners

Andrew Selous: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many pensioners live in the South West Bedfordshire constituency. [191010]

Mr. Timms: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician, who has been asked to reply.

Letter from Mr. Len Cook to Mr. Andrew Selous, dated 14 October 2004:

As National Statistician and Registrar General for England and Wales I have been asked to reply to your recent question asking how many pensioners live in the South West Bedfordshire constituency. (191010).

The latest available data for constituencies can be found in reports from the 2001 population census.

Figures from the Census 2001—Census Area Statistics for parliamentary Constituencies in England and Wales Indicate that on census day (29th April 2001) there were 15,401 people of pensionable age, (5,645 males aged 65 and over, and 9,756 females aged 60 and over), resident in the South West Bedfqrdshire constituency.

The Census 2001—Census Area Statistics for Parliamentary Constituencies in England and Wales CD was released on the 16th September 2004 and is now available in the House of Commons Library.

HEALTH

Cardiac Care

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about proposed changes to the provision of cardiac rehabilitation services in south-west Hampshire. [190754]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The configuration of local health services, including the provision of cardiac rehabilitation services, is a matter for the local national health service, working in partnership with its stakeholders and the local community. It is for NHS organisations to plan and develop services based on their specific local knowledge and expertise.

Departmental Services

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which services within his Department will be (a) affected by and (b) subject to job losses consequent on the cuts in the civil service announced in the Spending Review. [189638]

Ms Rosie Winterton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Boateng), on 16 September 2004, Official Report, column 1659W.

Derriford Hospital

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment he has made of the treatment provided for Mr. and Mrs. Walker by Derriford hospital in Plymouth on 3 September; and if he will make a statement; [190648]

(2) what the total cost was to the NHS of transporting Mrs. Paula Walker of Plympton from Derriford hospital, Plymouth to Merthyr Tydfil hospital and then on to Winchester hospital, in September. [190649]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Department has not made an assessment of the treatment provided for Mr. and Mrs. Walker at Derriford hospital in Plymouth on 3 September. In line with our policy of shifting the balance of power, responsibility for the provision of local health services rests with local national health service trusts and decisions about the treatment for patients are the responsibility of the clinicians involved in individual cases. The Plymouth Hospitals NHS Trust is responsible for services provided at Derriford hospital. The information requested about the cost to the NHS is not collected centrally.

Devon NHS Partnership Trust

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many places for heroin addiction for people aged (a) under 18 and (b) over 18 are provided by the Devon NHS Partnership Trust; [190867]

(2) what the average waiting time for mental health patients referred by general practitioners to community health teams is in the Devon NHS Partnership Trust area. [190868]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Drug Addiction Treatment

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will make a statement on the availability of drug rehabilitation services in Leeds; [189951]

(2) what changes in waiting times for drug addiction treatment there have been since 1997 in (a) West Yorkshire, (b) Leeds and (c) Leeds West Primary Care Trust area; and if he will make a statement. [190006]

Miss Melanie Johnson: A full range of drug services is provided in Leeds through both statutory and voluntary providers in accordance with the interventions identified in tiers 1–3 of "Models of Care". The city of Leeds does not have a tier 4 residential rehabilitation or in-patient detoxification service. All clients are provided with these services out of the city. The National Treatment Agency (NTA) is working with the local drug action team (DAT) to improve waiting times for these services.

The information requested on waiting times has been collected since 2002 and is shown in the tables.

Free School Fruit

Sandra Gidley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to the answer of 15 September 2004, Official Report, column 1646, on free school fruit, how many children will benefit from the school fruit and vegetable scheme in those parts of the Romsey constituency that do not have a Romsey post code. [190300]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Schools in the Romsey constituency will join the school fruit and vegetable scheme in November 2004, when children aged four to six will start receiving a free piece of fruit or vegetable each school day.

We are currently in the process of ensuring schools participate in the scheme and aggregating the numbers of eligible children in each school. In early November, we will know the precise number of children in the Romsey constituency who are benefiting from the scheme.

Hepatitis C

Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what comparisons his Department has made of the prevalence of hepatitis C in the UK with that of other EU members states; and what assessment his Department has made of the reasons for differences. [189818]

Miss Melanie Johnson: In 1996, the French Reseau National de Santé Publique carried out a project funded by the European Commission entitled European Survey on hepatitis C[1]. Individual member states provided estimates of the prevalence of hepatitis C in their countries, which are shown in the table. These estimates were based mainly on data about blood donors or selected groups and were presented as an order of magnitude rather than reliable estimates.

The survey showed that the prevalence of hepatitis C tended to be lower in northern European countries and higher in southern European countries. The reasons for these differences are not clear.

Note:
Figures given in italics were not reported in the survey questionnaires returned by member states, and were estimated by the authors of the report using the prevalence estimates from nearest neighbouring state.

In 1999, the World Health Organisation (WHO) published estimates of global hepatitis C prevalence by country that were derived from published studies and/or data submitted to the WHO. Differences in the population groups studied, methods of data collection and interpretation between countries, and availability of data means that the estimated prevalence shown does not necessarily represent the true prevalence in a country. These estimates are available on the WHO website at http://www.who.int/docstore/wer/pdf/1999/wer7449.pdf.

Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what comparisons his Department has made of the prevalence of hepatitis C in Scotland with that in the remainder of the UK. [189819]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The estimated prevalence of antibody to hepatitis C for the general population in Scotland is 0.9 per cent., compared with 0.5 per cent, for England.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much he plans to spend on the hepatitis C awareness campaign in (a) 2004 and (b) 2005. [190290]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested is shown, by financial year, in the table.

Hospital-acquired Infections

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the national healthcare standards referred to in Towards Cleaner Hospitals and lower rates of infection will replace the National Infection Control standard for acute NHS trusts. [186510]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The standards for better health are a new approach drawing on existing rules and guidance, including the national infection control standard for acute national health service trusts, rather than a direct replacement for the controls assurance standards. The Healthcare Commission will start a consultation in the autumn on how to assess performance against the new standards for better health.

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice has been received from the Government's Chief Medical Officer since the publication of the report "Winning Ways" about the approach which hospital chief executives should adopt in responding to recommendations by infection control teams on the closure of contaminated beds, wards and hospitals. [190123]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 13 October 2004]: The Chief Medical Officer has consistently advised that clinical priorities and clinical need should take precedence and guide the actions and decisions of those deciding on the closure of beds, wards and hospitals. Following the publication of "Winning Ways" we would expect the directors of infection prevention and control to advise on these issues to help ensure a consistent approach and for trust boards and chief executives to take account of this advice. The decision to close a ward is a local decision that depends on a local risk assessment.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the rates of MRSA infections among patients in each hospital trust in each of the last five years. [189408]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Information by individual named trust is only available from 2001, when, for the first time, mandatory surveillance for methicillin resistant Staphylococcus aureus blood stream infections was introduced. The rates per 1000 bed days are available on the Department's website at http://www.dh.gov.uk/assetRoot/04/08/58/93/04085893.pdf.

Clive Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what instructions his Department has given to hospital trusts to ensure that the monitoring and detection of MRSA is done on a consistent basis. [189813]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The national health service is recommended by the Department to use the report of a working party of the British Society for Antimicrobial Chemotherapy, Hospital Infection Society and the Infection Control Nurses Association, published in 1998, as guidance on the monitoring of methicillin resistant Staphylococcus aureus (MRSA) infection and colonisation. Patients who develop infection will have samples taken as part of their clinical care but trusts will also carry out screening for MRSA infection and colonisation.

The detection and identification of MRSA in samples is set out in the Bacteriology Standard Operating Procedures (BSOP), issued by the Health Protection Agency. All NHS laboratories accredited by Clinical Pathology Accreditation (UK) must have in place standard operating procedures that are based on, or give equivalent results to, these BSOP Standards.

New Zealand Goats Milk

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health why New Zealand goats milk is being prevented from reaching EU markets; under what procedures this restriction is being enacted; and if he will make a statement. [190209]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Rules on the composition, labelling and promotion of infant formulas and follow-on formulas are laid down in European Directive 91/321/EEC, which is implemented in the United Kingdom through national regulations.

Under the Directive, permitted sources of protein in infant formulas are cows' milk protein, soya protein isolates and partial protein hydrolysates. Infant formulas based on whole goats' milk protein are not permitted.

Mental Health Act

Sarah Teather: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many patients were sectioned under the Mental Health Act 1983 in each primary care trust (PCT) in London in each year since 1997; and what the average was for PCTs in England and Wales; [190476]

(2) how many patients were sectioned under sections (a) 2, (b) 3, (c) 4, (d) 135 and (e) 136 of the Mental Health Act 1983 in each primary care trust in London in each year since 1997; and what the average was for primary care trusts in England and Wales in each case. [190477]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The information is not collected centrally.

Midwives

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will develop and implement the NHS Community Midwifery Model; [190238]

(2) what his policy is on offering continuing care from a single midwife for each pregnant woman throughout the course of the pregnancy, labour and post-natal care. [190237]

Dr. Ladyman: I have met with the Independent Midwives Association to discuss their national health service community midwifery model. We are giving this careful consideration.

The maternity standard of the national service framework (NSF) for children, young people and maternity services was published on 15 September 2004. It asks all NHS maternity care providers and primary care trusts to ensure that all women are offered the support of a named midwife throughout pregnancy and that all women are able to contact a midwife day or night at any stage in pregnancy if they have concerns.

Implementing the NSF over its 10-year timescale is mandatory, although local agencies will have the flexibility to plan how these standards should be met.

Press Officers

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his projection is of the number of press officers employed in his Department for 2004–05. [187555]

Ms Rosie Winterton: There are currently 20 press officers in post and a number of vacancies will be filled by the end of 2004–05 to increase this number.

Prostate Cancer

Ross Cranston: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department is funding to develop a more reliable diagnostic test for prostate cancer. [189566]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Department and other National Cancer Research Institute (NCRI) funding partners have jointly established two centres of research excellence, known as the NCRI prostate cancer collaboratives. The Department is meeting half the total cost of £7.4 million over five years.

The NCRI prostate cancer collaboratives are undertaking several studies relevant to the diagnosis of prostate cancer. An important outcome from the collaborative based at the Institute of Cancer Research is the recent discovery of the overactive E2F3 gene in prostate cancer tumours, which provides the potential for a test to distinguish between aggressive and non-aggressive prostate cancer cells.

Ross Cranston: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has undertaken into the different frequencies with which men and women access primary care for cancer. [189571]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Department has not funded work specifically on this topic. The Department's policy research programme has however funded five projects costing £0.5 million on cancer referral strategies and primary care. The purpose of the research, which is nearing completion, has been to increase the evidence base to help general practitioners with the referral of patients with possible early symptoms of cancer. It has also looked at the extent of and reasons for delay by patients in presenting to general practice.

The results will contribute to the development of policy for improving the early detection of cancer in patients with symptoms.

Radiation Risks Committee

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will break down the costs of the Committee Examining Radiation Risks of Internal Emitters between (a) the costs of the secretariat, (b) the three-day workshop, (c) members' travel and subsistence and (d) other specified costs. [190207]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 11 October 2004]: A breakdown by specific budget heading is not available.

Tuberculosis

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when his Department plans to publish the action plan on tuberculosis. [187855]

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made on the National Service Framework for tuberculosis. [188106]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Stopping Tuberculosis in England, an action plan from the Chief Medical Officer, was published on 7 October. Copies have been placed in the Library.

PRIME MINISTER

China

Mr. Gray: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he held at 10 Downing Street with President Jiang Zemin during his visit in 1999 on human rights abuses (a) in China and (b) in Tibet. [190805]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) on 1 April 2004, Official Report, column 1568W.

Climate Change

Mr. Drew: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he has had with representatives of the churches on their launch of Operation Noah to draw attention to the threat posed by climate change. [190908]

The Prime Minister: I have meetings with a wide range of organisations and individuals. As with previous Administrations, it is not the Government's practice to provide details of all such meetings under exemptions 2 and 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Iraq

Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister whether he discussed regime change in Iraq in any meeting with President Bush since January 2001. [190763]

The Prime Minister: I regularly have discussions on a wide range of issues with President Bush including on Iraq. As with previous Administrations, it is not the practice of this Government to make public details of discussions with foreign Governments.

Harry Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will declassify and place in the Library the Government documents published in the Daily Telegraph on 18 September about war with Iraq; whether these documents were disclosed to Lord Hutton and Lord Butler; and if he will make a statement. [190986]

The Prime Minister: No. The Government co-operated fully with the Hutton Inquiry and the Butler Review.

India

Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister whether he asked the Indian Prime Minister about the prospects of India signing the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty during his meeting with him on 20 September. [190761]

Keith Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on his meeting with the Indian Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh. [190788]

The Prime Minister: I discussed a range of bilateral and international issues with the Indian Prime Minister. I refer my hon. Friend to the joint India-United Kingdom declaration which is available on the No. 10 website.

CABINET OFFICE

Departmental Responsibilities

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office which of the functions listed on page 6 of the Cabinet Office Departmental Report 2004 as having been exercised by the hon. Member for Paisley, South, when Minister for the Cabinet Office and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, will in future be exercised (a) by her and (b) by the right hon. Member for Darlington. [189713]

Ruth Kelly: Details of my responsibilities and those of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster can be found in the "List of Ministerial Responsibilities".

A revised edition of the List of Ministerial Responsibilities (October 2004) has been published today and copies placed in the Library. It can also be obtained electronically at www.knowledgenetwork.gov.uk/elmr/minister.nsf.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Anthony Blunt

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what records are (a) open to public inspection and (b) withheld concerning meetings between Anthony Blunt and the late King George VI; and if he will make a statement. [190430]

Mr. Leslie: As Anthony Blunt was not employed by HM Government prior to the death of George V in 1936, it is most unlikely that any record of his meetings would form part of the public record, whether open or withheld. A search in the electronic catalogue of public records kept by the National Archives does not reveal any records relating to Anthony Blunt which are dated during the reign of George V.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what records are retained that are (a) open to and (b) withheld from public inspection as to (i) the facilities that were extended by the Government to Anthony Blunt in order that he could fulfil his mission to Germany in 1945 at the request of HM King George VI and (ii) the purpose of that visit as understood by Her Majesty's Government at that time; and if he will make a statement. [190431]

Mr. Leslie: A search of the National Archives' catalogue, which is publicly available on the internet, does not reveal any records relating to a visit to Germany made by Anthony Blunt in 1945. Neither is there a reference to the visit in the extensive index to Foreign Office papers available in the reading rooms at the National Archives.

I am not aware of any other material held by Government Departments on this matter.

District Judges

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what child care provision is made available for primary carers who are district judges. [191032]

Mr. Leslie: While there is no specific judicial child care provision, all salaried judicial office holders are entitled to a range of employment benefits including Maternity Leave, Adoption Leave, Paternity Leave and Parental Leave. Office holders are also entitled to up to seven days special paid leave to address urgent domestic needs, and, with effect from 1 April 2005, part time working will become available for all judicial office holders below High Court level, subject to business needs.

In addition, on 13 October the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs launched a consultation paper, "Increasing Diversity in the Judiciary", which examines the current lack of diversity in the judiciary and asks for views on a wide range of issues, including whether increased opportunities for flexible working would encourage people with other commitments, such as child care responsibilities, to apply for judicial office.

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what assessment has been made of the effects of the practice of advertising vacancies for district judges (crime) on the number of women applicants with families. [191033]

Mr. Leslie: None. However, on 13 October my Department launched a consultation paper, "Increasing Diversity in the Judiciary", which takes a radical look at the steps needed to widen the pool from which applicants for judicial appointment are drawn, while continuing to make appointments on merit. It examines the extent of, and the reasons for, the lack of diversity in the judiciary and the barriers that may discourage people from applying for judicial appointment. Information and communication strategies and the appointments process are among the areas covered by the paper. Comments and suggestions are invited by 21 January 2005.

Weekend Courts

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs (1) what kinds of case will be tried in the proposed weekend courts; [191030]

(2) what proposals the Secretary of State has for weekend courts in (a) district judge jurisdiction and (b) the Crown court; [191031]

(3) whether the proposed weekend courts will be piloted before being introduced nationally; and if he will make a statement; [191029]

(4) what provision will be made to take account of lawyers' family responsibilities in the proposed arrangements for weekend courts. [191218]

Mr. Leslie: On 13 October, the Secretary of State launched a consultation paper, "Increasing Diversity in the Judiciary", which examines the current lack of diversity in the judiciary and asks for views on a wide range of issues, including whether increased opportunities for flexible working would encourage people with other commitments, such as child care responsibilities, to apply for judicial office. One idea offered for discussion in this context is whether court sittings at the weekends or in the evenings might offer a means of introducing greater flexibility into the working arrangements of the judiciary. Were such a suggestion to be seriously considered in the future, it would be necessary to balance the interests of other groups, in particular our customers, against those of potential candidates for judicial appointment.

At present, there are no plans to introduce weekend courts, beyond those arrangements already in place. Some magistrates courts, for instance, do regularly sit on Saturdays to conduct business. In particular, weekend courts in magistrates courts were considered as a result Lord Justice Auld review of the criminal courts. He recommended that there be a > "thorough examination of the need for and the costs/benefits of extending court working hours ....".

The Government, therefore, decided to pilot alternative working hours in magistrates courts in order to test possible improvements on the courts' efficiency and effectiveness in the interests of the whole criminal justice system. In consequence weekend, evenings and early morning courts were piloted in London and Manchester magistrates courts in 2002.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Afghanistan

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in which establishments prisoners are kept in Afghanistan; how many prisoners are in each one; what assessment he has made of compliance with the Geneva Conventions in respect of such prisoners; which of the establishments the International Committee of the Red Cross are not allowed to visit; what the Government's position on access to such establishments by the International Committee of the Red Cross is; what representations have been made about such access; and if he will make a statement. [190230]

Mr. Rammell: The Afghan government has a network of state prisons. The US-led Coalition has detention facilities at Bagram airbase and at other US bases in Afghanistan. There are also reports of illegal private prisons in Afghanistan, run by militia commanders.

We do not have accurate information on the numbers of detainees held in prisons in Afghanistan. The Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission (AIHRC) believes that there are approximately 4,000 to 5,000 detainees in Afghan government prisons. The AIHRC estimates that the number of detainees in US detention is between 200 and 300. Up to 100 people may be detained in private jails.

We understand the ICRC has had access to Afghan government prisons and to US detention facilities in Bagram and Kandahar. The UK welcomes this access, and calls for the ICRC to be given full access to detention facilities throughout Afghanistan. ICRC reports on detainees are, however, strictly confidential between the ICRC and the country concerned.

The UK calls for prisoners' rights to be fully respected and due process to be applied to all prisoners, in accordance with the Geneva Conventions and international human rights law.

In May 2004 the UK lobbied the Afghan government to ease overcrowding in Shiberghan prison in northern Afghanistan. Approximately 1,000 prisoners were transferred from the control of General Dostum to the Interior Ministry, and transferred to the central Pol-e-Charki prison in Kabul. The UN reported that conditions and respect for human rights had improved following the transfer.

Bangladesh

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has been informed that the perpetrators of the 21 August bombings in Bangladesh have been identified. [189689]

Mr. Alexander: No. We understand that a judicial inquiry has recently submitted its report to the Bangladeshi Government. Its findings have not been made public.

British Travellers (Safety)

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions have taken place with the Governments of (a) Thailand, (b) Vietnam, (c) Indonesia, (d) Cambodia and (e) Malaysia regarding the safety of British travellers. [189889]

Mr. Alexander: We regularly discuss with all these Governments issues which may affect the safety of British travellers. These issues include the threat from terrorism, transnational and local crime and health risks.

Cyprus

Tom Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what recent dates discussions have taken place between representatives of the British Government and the representatives of the Greek Cypriot Government in Brussels; and what subjects were discussed. [183971]

Mr. MacShane: I would like to apologise to my hon. Friend for the late reply to his question. This was the result of an administrative error. Measures have been taken to ensure that this does not happen again.

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and I meet our Greek Cypriot colleagues regularly, most recently in Brussels at the General Affairs and External Relations Council on 11 October.

I am looking forward to discussing a wide range of issues to promote the interests of all the people of Cyprus during a forthcoming visit to the island.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the United Kingdom will oppose (a) the allocation of EU funds to and (b) the use of EU funds in Cyprus where such funds may be allocated to projects that involve, or pertain to, property of displaced persons who have not received compensation; and if he will make a statement. [190433]

Mr. MacShane: The Government is committed to fulfilment by the EU of the mandate of the Council of Ministers to end the isolation of the Turkish Cypriots. The planned disbursement of €259 million of EU funds is an important element of this. The regulation establishing an instrument of financial support for encouraging the economic development of the Turkish Cypriot community which would enable it to do so is still under discussion. We hope the regulation will include the following phrase

> "the Commission shall act in accordance with the case law of the European Court of Human Rights".

The Government considers that this should be sufficient to satisfy all those who have concerns regarding property in the north of Cyprus.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment the Government has made of the compatibility of the Annan V Plan with the Law of the Sea Convention as it relates to the Republic of Cyprus's sovereign rights over Cyprus's territorial waters; and if he will make a statement. [190435]

Mr. MacShane: The Government assessed and was satisfied that the Annan Plan was compatible with international maritime law.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has received the European Commission's proposals for spending structural funds in Turkish-occupied Northern Cyprus; and if he will make a statement. [190436]

Mr. MacShane: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has not received any European Commission proposals on this subject. The Commission cannot finalise their proposals before the regulation establishing an instrument of financial support for encouraging the economic development of the Turkish Cypriot community is agreed.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reasons United Kingdom representatives urged the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe to delay pressing Turkey into ending property violations in Cyprus found by the European Court of Human Rights in the case Cyprus v. Turkey in May 2001; and if he will make a statement. [190437]

Mr. MacShane: The Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe was aware of the context in which the decision on Cypriot property was being made. If all sides had agreed to a settlement on the basis of the UN Secretary General's comprehensive settlement proposals then it would no longer be necessary to refer cases to the ECHR as property issues would be dealt with by a domestic court in Cyprus.

The UK believed that achieving a Cyprus settlement and thus putting in place a domestic remedy for property disputes was more beneficial than pushing through an immediate decision on property violations at the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe.

We always encourage member states to comply with the court's judgments and will continue to do so.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if the Government will oppose initiatives in the UN for international recognition of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus; and if he will make a statement; [190438]

(2) what his policy is on adherence to UN Security Council resolutions 541 (1983) and 550 (1984) concerning Cyprus; and if he will make a statement. [190959]

Mr. MacShane: The Government are not aware of any initiatives in the UN for recognition of the "Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus". Moreover, the Turkish Cypriot leaders and Turkish Government have stated repeatedly that recognition is not their aim.

The Government's policy on recognition of the "TRNC" has not changed. We do not recognise the "TRNC"; UNSCRs 541 and 550 remain valid.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Government will make it their policy to require a timetable for the withdrawal of Turkish troops from Cyprus to be agreed as a precondition for the opening of negotiations on Turkey's accession to the EU; and if he will make a statement. [190439]

Mr. MacShane: The withdrawal of Turkish troops from the north of Cyprus is not a precondition for the opening of negotiation with Turkey.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the Government's policy is on the suggestion in paragraph 93 of the report of the UN Secretary General on his Mission of Good Offices in Cyprus concerning Security Council members giving a lead to states to co-operate to eliminate unnecessary restrictions and barriers that have the effect of isolating Turkish Cypriots; and if he will make a statement. [190440]

Mr. MacShane: The British Government fully support the EU policy agreed at the April General Affairs and External Relations Council on 26 April to end the isolation of the Turkish Cypriots. We welcomed the extra impetus given to that aim by the UN Secretary General's report on his Good Offices Mission. This policy is wholly in accordance with relevant UN Security Council Resolutions on Cyprus.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action the Government have taken to further the call by the UN Security Council to lift restrictions imposed by Turkey on the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus; and if he will make a statement. [190442]

Mr. MacShane: The Government have regular contact with the Turkish Government on a whole variety of issues including UN Peace Keeping Force in Cyprus (UNFICYP). Over the last four years, we have repeatedly raised the need to lift restrictions on the UNFICYP.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps need to be taken to permit Cyprus to become a member of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development; what steps the Government have taken to further Cyprus's application; and if he will make a statement. [190443]

Mr. MacShane: The OECD is currently working on establishing a set of objective criteria for its admission of new members, rather than making decisions on a case by case basis. While that work is still in progress, it would be premature to comment on an application by Cyprus to the OECD.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Government concluded that the aide-memoire of the Republic of Cyprus handed to the UN on 20 April 2004 during the deliberations on the British-USA draft resolution constituted sufficient proposals for security within Cyprus; and if he will make a statement. [190444]

Mr. MacShane: The Government regret that efforts to provide reassurance to Greek Cypriots on the security and implementation aspects of the settlement prior to the referenda, via a strongly worded Security Council resolution, were unsuccessful. The draft resolution, jointly sponsored by the UK and US, received almost unanimous support in the Security Council, but was opposed by the Greek Cypriot side and subsequently vetoed by Russia.

In its aide-memoire of 20 April, the Government of the Republic of Cyprus called on the Security Council not to adopt any resolution regarding the Cyprus Problem before the referendums. The aide-memoire contained the changes they deemed necessary to the draft UK-US sponsored resolution.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consideration was given to whether to ask the European Commission to consider the final Annan Plan for Cyprus in relation to its compatibility with the acquis communautaire; and if he will make a statement. [190446]

Mr. MacShane: The European Commission was present at the final stage of settlement negotiations. The commission was satisfied with the UN Secretary General's settlement plan and that where there were derogations from the acquis they were time limited. In his speech at the High Level Preparatory Donors' conference on 15 April, Commissioner Verheugen said:

> "I would like to stress that the Annan Plan is in line with the fundamental principles on which the European Union is founded and that the viability and the economic sustainability have been strengthened".

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the occasions on which the Government have cautioned UK citizens about the possible liabilities and consequences of purchasing land and property in the northern occupied part of Cyprus, with particular reference to the success of negotiations towards a united Republic of Cyprus; what method was used in each case; and if he will make a statement. [190447]

Mr. MacShane: The Cyprus travel advice on the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) website: www.fco.gov.uk has very clear language on purchasing property in the north of Cyprus. We recommend that those considering buying property seek legal advice before doing so. We also draw attention to the political situation in Cyprus.

The advice given to those who telephone the FCO or the British High Commission in Nicosia with a query regarding buying property in the north of Cyprus, is consistent with that available on the FCO website.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether a representative of the UK Government discussed with (a) Kofi Annan and (b) Alvaro de Soto the documents of (i) 15 March 2004 and (ii) 20 April 2004 submitted by the Republic of Cyprus on security; and if he will make a statement. [190464]

Mr. MacShane: British officials had regular exchanges with the UN Secretary General and the UN Secretary General's Special Representative for Cyprus, Alvaro De Soto, on all aspects of security in the Annan Plan.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) whether the Government supported the provision in the Annan Plan to extend EU citizenship to Turkish citizens resident in Northern Cyprus; by what method it was proposed to identify those who would have so qualified; and if he will make a statement; [190465]

(2) how many Turkish citizens who settled in occupied northern Cyprus would be eligible for EU citizenship under the final Annan Plan for Cyprus; and if he will make a statement. [190466]

Mr. MacShane: In the final version of the Annan Plan, the number of persons entitled to citizenship was not changed. The number of those resident in northern Cyprus of mainland Turkish origin who could become citizens of the new Cyprus was capped at 45,000, with preference given to spouses of Turkish Cypriots and people born in Cyprus. Others eligible were identified on the basis of length of stay. Each side submitted to the UN before the referenda on 24 April a list of less than 45,000 persons who would acquire citizenship, in addition to those who had citizenship in 1963 and their descendants, on entry into force of the Foundation Agreement.

The Government supported the Annan Plan and continue to believe that it remains the only foreseeable basis on which a settlement can be achieved.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the Government's policy was on the element of the Annan Plan for Cyprus that would have provided for a Turkish immigration quota allowing for further settlement from Turkey in a reunited Cyprus; what assessment he made of the (a) numbers and (b) time scale proposed; whether EU citizenship was to be extended to such settlers; and if he will make a statement. [190467]

Mr. MacShane: As stated in Kofi Annan's report to the Security Council of 2 June (paragraph 50), a safeguard mechanism was introduced into the final version of the Annan Plan related to Greek and Turkish immigration. This was done in response to Greek Cypriot concerns that there be no continuous flow of Turkish immigrants to Cyprus. Instead of a permanent quota which could, theoretically, have been regularly refilled, the UN amended Annan V to include a cap on Turkish immigration of 5 per cent. as a proportion of Turkish Cypriots for 19 years. Thereafter, to preserve its identity, Cyprus could adopt specified non-discriminatory safeguard measures in conformity with the acquis communautaire in respect of immigration of Greek and Turkish nationals.

The Foundation Agreement in the Annan Plan established the criteria of eligibility for Cypriot citizenship and residency. The federal citizenship law, as agreed by both sides during the negotiations, set out the detailed rules and procedures for granting citizenship of the new United Cyprus Republic. The full draft citizenship law can be found at www.cyprus-un-plan.org.

The Government supported the UN Secretary-General's Proposals for a Comprehensive Settlement in Cyprus and welcomed the UN's attempts in the finalisation process to address Greek Cypriot concerns, including in relation to citizenship.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his estimate is of the number of Turkish settlers who are not de jure citizens of the Republic of Cyprus but who were included in the electoral roll used by the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus when it conducted its referendum on the Annan Plan for Cyprus in April; what proportion in percentage terms this group constitutes as a share of total register; and if he will make a statement. [190468]

Mr. MacShane: We do not have an estimate of that figure. The UN was satisfied that the referendum was a fair expression of the Turkish Cypriots' desire to be part of a united island.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the Government's policy is on the decision not to incorporate the recommendations of the Technical Committee on Economic and Financial Aspects of Implementation into the fifth and final Annan Plan for a settlement in Cyprus; what representations the United Kingdom made in relation to the matter; and if he will make a statement. [190469]

Mr. MacShane: The Government is not aware of such a decision.

At the High Level Preparatory Donors' Conference on 15 April, representatives of the World Bank, the IMF and other international financial institutions, all concluded that the Annan Plan was economically viable. At the same event the international community pledged a significant amount of financial aid to Cyprus in the event of a settlement.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions were held at Bürgenstock on possible derogations from (a) EU and (b) other legislation relating to (i) human rights and (ii) property rights within Cyprus; what policy was adopted by United Kingdom representatives in relation to these topics; and if he will make a statement. [190470]

Mr. MacShane: There were discussions at Buergenstock on all aspects of the Annan Plan, including property and human rights. The EU Enlargement Commissioner, Gunther Verheugen, was present during the final stage of negotiations at Buergenstock and was satisfied with all derogations and that they were time limited. In the final version of the plan, any restrictions would be removed after 15 years. The Government agrees with the Commission's view that the Annan Plan is in line with the fundamental principles on which the European Union is founded.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish the documents distributed by British representatives at Bürgenstock meetings on Cyprus entitled (a) the UN Secretary General's Plan for a Cyprus settlement and (b) Cyprus: Bürgenstock: The Final Day (31 March 2004), summary; for what purposes these memorandums were distributed; and to whom. [190471]

Mr. MacShane: British representatives did not distribute such documents at Buergenstock. They reported the developments to London by telegram in the normal fashion. These telegrams were marked restricted, were for UK use only and were not distributed to other participants at the Buergenstock meetings.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the European Council has been advised that the sovereign Republic of Cyprus shall be competent to define points of entry and exit of EU goods and people in the island of Cyprus; and if he will make a statement. [190472]

Mr. MacShane: The European Council approved the terms of the Republic of Cyprus's accession to the EU.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the Government's policy is towards the proposal set out by President Papadopoulos of Cyprus to the European Commission on 23 August 2004 that Varosha should be returned to the jurisdiction of the Republic of Cyprus and that the management of the port of Famagusta should be vested in a body representative of both communities and chaired by a nominee of the European Commission; and if he will make a statement. [190473]

Mr. MacShane: The British government welcomes in principle any measure taken by either side in Cyprus with the aim of contributing to a climate of increased trust and confidence between the two communities. Where such measures need to be mutually agreed, clearly they should be balanced and realistic. However, such measures are not a substitute for a settlement based on the Annan plan.

East Timor

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Government of East Timor. [189679]

Mr. Alexander: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary met the President of East Timor Xanana Gusmao, during his visit to the UK in October 2003. My predecessor, the then Minister of State at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mike O'Brien) met East Timor's Foreign Minister, Dr. Ramos Horta, during his visit to the UK in June this year. Both meetings covered a wide range of topics including how to bring to justice those responsible for human rights violations in East Timor, East Timor's relationship with her neighbours, including boundary issues, and the future of the UN mission in East Timor (UNMISET).

EU Trade

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Government will urge the European Commission to examine the legality of trade by an EU State with any part of any EU territory where it is not possible to enforce the acquis communautaire; and if he will make a statement. [190960]

Mr. MacShane: The Commission has examined the legality of direct trade with northern Cyprus in the context of the draft regulation it has presented to the Council to enable preferential direct trade between northern Cyprus and the rest of the EU. The Government agrees with the Commission's legal position and supports adoption of the regulation.

European Constitutional

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the implications for the justice system in the UK of the clause on page 32 of the proposed European Constitutional Treaty, Cm 6289, which requires that the severity of sentences should not be disproportionate to the offence; and to which penalties this principle will apply. [190520]

Mr. MacShane: The Government does not consider that there will be any direct implications from Article 11–49 (Command Paper 6289) for the UK justice system. The Article reflects the general principle of proportionality between penalties and criminal offences which is enshrined in the common constitutional traditions of the Member States, including the UK, and in the case law of the ECJ. Article 11–49 must moreover be read in conjunction with Article 11–51, which makes clear that the Charter only applies to member states when implementing Union law and does not extend the field of application of Union law.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the implications for the UK of the obligation on page 15 of the proposed European Constitutional Treaty, Cm 6289, to co-ordinate economic, employment and social policies. [190521]

Mr. MacShane: The Constitution would not confer any new powers on the EU for the co-ordination of economic, employment and social policy. As under the current Treaty (TEC), Member States would co-ordinate their policies within the Union. The new Article I-14 (CIG 86/04) refers to the arrangements detailed in Part III of the Constitution which carry forward those already in place under TEC.

European Human Security Response Force

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the United Kingdom Government's policy is on the proposal to create a European Human Security Response Force. [190299]

Mr. MacShane: The UK considers the proposal for a European Human Security Response Force put forward by the Study Group on Europe's Security Capabilities as an interesting contribution to the debate on how best to improve the EU's ability to prevent conflicts and respond to crises.

As the paper points out, much is already being done under European Security and Defence Policy to improve military and civilian capabilities, through the Headline Goal and Action Plan for Civilian ESDP, and through improved civilian/military co-ordination. The agreed objective is to have more readily available and rapidly deployable civilian and military assets to underpin EU activity in conflict prevention and crisis management.

Iran

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Iran over the public hanging of Atefe Rajab in Neka in Nazandaran province on 15 August. [190194]

Mr. Rammell: We have serious concerns about the use of the death penalty in Iran, including public executions and the execution of juvenile offenders. Reports suggest Ms Rajab, a 16-year-old girl, was hanged, in public, for 'acts incompatible with chastity'. My noble Friend the Baroness Symons of Vernham Dean has made our strong concern clear to the Iranian authorities. We also continue to raise our concerns about Iran's use of the death penalty through the EU/Iran human rights dialogue.

Iraq

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received of Arabs being forced from their homes in Kirkuk and the surrounding area; who has been responsible for making them homeless; what his estimate is of the number of such displaced people residing in camps in north-central Iraq; what (a) position and (b) action the UK Government has taken on this issue; and if he will make a statement. [190228]

Mr. Rammell: Since the opening of the British Office in Kirkuk on 28 June 2004, neither they, nor the American Office, with whom they are collocated, are aware of any case where Arabisation Arabs (people that the Government of Saddam Hussein brought in to settle the North of Iraq in an attempt to change the demographics of the region) have been forced from their homes in Kirkuk. The British Office monitors closely the situation of the Internally Displaced People (IDPs) and relationships between the different ethnic groups in Kirkuk and the surrounding area, and reports on a regular basis to London. There are an estimated 50,000–70,000 IDPs in camps in Kirkuk and the surrounding area. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary discussed these issues with local politicians during his visit to Kirkuk on 5 October and encouraged all to work together to resolve these issues, through political dialogue and the legal framework agreed in the Transitional Administrative Law (TAL).

Israel

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether British volunteers were among the members of the Christian Peacemaker Team who were attacked and seriously injured near the Israeli settlement of Maon in the South Hebron Hills on 30 September; and if he will ask the Israeli government to take steps to ensure the safety of British members of the team engaging in peacemaking activities. [190196]

Mr. Rammell: The British Consulate General in Jerusalem has not received any reports of British volunteers being involved in the incident in Hebron on 30 September. Foreign and Commonwealth Office Ministers as well as officials based in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, have requested that the Government of Israel ensure the safety of all British citizens in the Occupied Territories. We also frequently raise with the Israeli authorities the cases of individual British nationals who have been detained by or come into conflict with Israeli security forces. British travellers should also, however, take responsibility for their own safety by paying careful attention to our Travel Advice for the Occupied Territories.

Maldives

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Maldivian Democratic Party. [189861]

Mr. Alexander: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has not had any discussions with the Maldivian Democratic Party (MDP). However officials in London and at our High Commission in Colombo maintain regular contact with representatives of the MDP.

Ministerial Travel

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the cost was of chartering an aeroplane for his recent trip to Sudan. [188456]

Mr. Straw [pursuant to his reply, 15 September 2004, c. 1616W]: Due to an administration error, an incorrect answer was given to the right hon. and learned Gentleman's question. The answer should read as follows:

The gross cost of chartering an aircraft for the return trip UK-Sudan-Kenya was £168,000. Accompanying media contributed £51,700, making a net cost of £116,300.

Oil for Food Programme

Hugh Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many countries have instigated their own inquiries into alleged corruption at the UN during the Oil for Food Programme. [190921]

Mr. Rammell: The Government of Iraq have instigated an investigation under the auspices of their Board of Supreme Audit. We are also aware that there are a number of hearings into the allegations of corruption under the Oil for Food Programme in both Houses of the United States Congress. The United Nations Secretary General has separately appointed an independent high-level inquiry into the allegations, which we support fully.

Hugh Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the list published in the Iraqi newspaper al-Moda of those accused of corruption at the UN during the Oil for Food Programme in Iraq. [190922]

Mr. Rammell: Allegations of corruption of the United Nations Oil for Food Programme are being investigated by the independent high-level inquiry appointed by the United Nations Secretary General in April 2004. We fully support the inquiry. It would be premature to comment on the allegations until the inquiry has reported its findings.

Hugh Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the initial report of the Volcker Inquiry into alleged corruption at the UN during the Oil for Food Programme in Iraq. [190923]

Mr. Rammell: The first report of the United Nations independent high-level inquiry into allegations of corruption and mismanagement of the Oil for Food Programme was published on 9 August. The report provided background information on the Programme and the status of the inquiry, including its terms of reference and staffing details. It did not draw substantive conclusions. We look forward to the next report from the independent inquiry.

Hugh Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the findings of the Iraq Survey Group in relation to allegations of corruption at the UN during the Oil for Food Programme in Iraq. [190924]

Mr. Rammell: The report of the Iraq Survey Group, published on 6 October, made a number of allegations with regard to the United Nations Oil for Food Programme. Such allegations are being investigated by the independent high-level inquiry appointed by the United Nations Secretary General in April 2004. We fully support the inquiry. It would be premature to comment on the allegations until the independent inquiry has reported its findings.

Ports Access

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Government will urge the European Commission to examine the legality of entry by merchant shipping of an EU state into part of an EU member state's territory where it is not possible to enforce the acquis communautaire; and if he will make a statement. [190480]

Mr. MacShane: The Government does not believe that there is an issue over the legality of a merchant ship flying the flag of an EU Member State entering part of another Member State's territory where the acquis communautaire is not applied.

UK Mission (Bugging)

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to the answer of 9 March 2004, Official Report, column 1438W, on UK Mission (bugging), what progress has been made by the Belgian authorities in identifying who had bugged the UK Mission in the Justus Lipsius Council of Ministers building in 2003; and if he will make a statement. [190296]

Mr. MacShane: The Belgian authorities have continued their investigations into the discovery of a number of devices in the Justus Lipsius Council of Ministers building last year. We and the other member states concerned are co-operating closely with the authorities.

Venezuela

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Venezuelan (a) Government, (b) opposition parties and (c) other interested parties; and if he will make a statement. [186414]

Mr. Rammell: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 13 September 2004, Official Report, column 1456W.

Vietnam

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to his European counterparts concerning a demarche to the government of Vietnam on the imprisoned human rights activist Reverend Nguyen Hong Quang; and what discussions he has had with the EU Commissioner for External Affairs concerning the case of Reverend Quang. [190193]

Mr. Alexander: We regularly discuss human rights issues in Vietnam, including freedom of religion, with our EU partners with a view to raising our concerns under the EU's regular formal human rights dialogue with the Vietnamese government.

We will continue to press the Vietnamese government to adhere to its international human rights obligations at every suitable opportunity.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on bilateral relations with Vietnam. [190497]

Mr. Alexander: UK-Vietnam bilateral relations are healthy and strengthening. Alongside growing diplomatic, trade and development links, our relationship is also diversifying into new areas such as education and culture, discussions on human rights, and fighting international terrorism and crime.

This year alone, there have been a number of high level visits. In October, my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister led the UK delegation to the Asia-Europe Meeting V Summit in Hanoi. In May, the Vietnamese President Tran Due Luong made an official visit to the UK, where he met Her Majesty the Queen and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. The All Party Parliamentary Group on Vietnam, led by my hon. Friend, visited Vietnam in September.

The Department for International Development's (DfID) fast growing aid programme is a key part of our strengthening bilateral relationship. UK development assistance to Vietnam is increasing from £20 million in 2003 to £60 million in 2005. DfID have just announced a new £10 million commitment to strengthen the Vietnamese Government's own poverty reduction programmes.

The UK is one of the largest EU investors in Vietnam, with UK investment totalling approximately £2.2 billion and rising. Bilateral trade also continues to grow year-on-year and, in 2003, amounted to £1.0 billion. UK trade and investment is set to increase further following the recent EU-Vietnam bilateral agreement on the terms of Vietnam's accession to the World Trade Organisation.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the treatment of ethnic minorities in Vietnam. [190513]

Mr. Alexander: Ethnic minority groups in Vietnam live mostly in remote and mountainous areas, which also suffer the highest rates of poverty. The Vietnamese Government and international donors (including the Department for International Development) are investing heavily in these areas to reduce poverty rates among ethnic minority communities.

During Easter 2004, there was unrest in the ethnic-minority populated central highlands region over land and religious freedom issues. Over recent years, some ethnic minority communities have lost traditional lands to Vietnamese inward migrants. Freedom of religion, especially among ethnic minority Protestants, is also not always respected at local level.

We raise issues relating to ethnic minorities, including land and religious freedom, with the Vietnamese Government regularly. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary raised our concerns about human rights in Vietnam with the Vietnamese Foreign Minister during the official visit of the Vietnamese President to London in May. The then Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien) also raised these issues with the Vietnamese President on the same day. With EU partners, we again raised these issues at the most recent session of our regular EU-Vietnam Human Rights Dialogue in June.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Ambulances

Lembit Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many ambulances have been involved in road traffic accidents in the last two years in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement. [188371]

Angela Smith: In the last two years for which information is available (15 April 2002 to 14 April 2004), 90 accident and emergency and 31 patient care service (non-emergency) Northern Ireland Ambulance Service (NIAS) ambulances were involved in road traffic accidents. The number of road traffic accidents reported must be seen in the context of the 677,000 emergency and non-emergency patient journeys undertaken by the NIAS over the past two years, a significant number of which were undertaken in a high risk environment. NIAS remains fully committed to ensuring the safety of its service users and its staff.

The Department of Health, Social Service and Public Safety does not hold information about accidents involving other ambulance service providers in Northern Ireland.

Lembit Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many road traffic accidents involving Mercedes Sprinter style ambulances there were in the last two years in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement. [188372]

Angela Smith: In the last two years for which information is available (15 April 2002–14 April 2004), 64 Northern Ireland Ambulance Service Mercedes Sprinter A&E ambulances were involved in road traffic accidents. I am not aware of any specific road safety issues in relation to the Mercedes Sprinter type ambulances.

The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety does not hold information about accidents involving other ambulance service providers in Northern Ireland.

Assets Recovery Agency

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) republican and (b) loyalist terrorists have been investigated by the Assets Recovery Agency in Northern Ireland; and how many people have been convicted in the courts following investigation. [190866]

Mr. Pearson: The Assets Recovery Agency has had 44 cases referred to it by the law enforcement agencies. The cases cover the whole range of organised crime among all groupings and areas across Northern Ireland.

The purpose of the Assets Recovery Agency is to reduce crime through civil recovery of assets and I do not, therefore, anticipate criminal convictions.

Where criminal proceedings are appropriate, the case is referred back to the appropriate prosecuting authority.

Belfast Plan

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the Draft Belfast Metropolitan Area Plan for 2015 will be published. [187953]

Angela Smith: The publication date for the Plan is presently being finalised by my officials. It will be published in late November 2004.

Birds

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what estimate he has made of the number of (a) lapwing, (b) peeweet, (c) yellow yornie, (d) curlew, (e) corncrake, (f) buzzard and (g) peregrine falcons in Northern Ireland. [187788]

Angela Smith: The Department of the Environment (Northern Ireland) monitors the populations of breeding and over-wintering birds in Northern Ireland. These surveys tend to assess the populations of the more common and widespread species. Less common species require targeted surveys to assess population trends.

The species on which data have been requested are listed below; in each case, the figure is an estimate for the Northern Ireland population.

The breeding population of Lapwing is estimated at 1600 pairs (2000).

The wintering population of Lapwing: 17044 (2000). The peewet is a local name for the Lapwing.

The breeding population of Yellowhammer (yellow yornie): 300 pairs (2004).

The breeding population of Curlew: 1750 pairs (2000).

The wintering population of Curlew: 6893 (2001).

The breeding population of Corncrake: 0 pairs.

The breeding population of Buzzard: 200 pairs (1991).

The breeding population of Peregrine Falcon: 72 pairs (2002).

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action he will take to boost farmland bird numbers in the Province. [187789]

Angela Smith: Northern Ireland government departments, in partnership with voluntary organisations, have been involved in the development of actions plans at a UK and Northern Ireland level. These plans aim to increase populations of those species that have declined most severely, such as Skylark and Curlew; and to increase the extent and quality of the habitats they use. Plans for several additional species such as Yellowhammer and Lapwing are currently being prepared by my Department and will be published next year.

The plans include a range of actions undertaken by Northern Ireland government departments, including research, site-based conservation activities and the provision of guidance and advice. Many of the most significant actions fall to the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD) and are designed to encourage and support wildlife friendly farming practices. These include the continued development of agri-environment schemes such as Environmentally Sensitive Areas (ESA) and the Countryside Management Schemes (CMS) and new initiatives such as Good Farming Practice.

Care Homes

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how long residents of the Irish Republic are required to live in Northern Ireland before they can take up places at care homes in the Province. [190590]

Angela Smith: Once a person from outside the United Kingdom takes up permanent residence in Northern Ireland, he or she becomes eligible to receive health and social care on a similar basis to other residents.

Carers

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) men and (b) women in Northern Ireland over state retirement age are caring for elderly parents or relatives. [190177]

Mr. Pearson: The 2001 Census of Population showed that (a) 9,690 men and (b) 18,816 women, who were over state retirement age at the time of the Census, were involved in looking after or giving help or support to family members, friends, neighbours or others because of long-term physical or mental ill-health or disability or problems related to age. It is not possible to identify those who were caring specifically for elderly parents or relatives.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what benefits are available for people reaching state pension age who still care for elderly parents or relatives in their retirement. [190178]

Mr. Spellar: Carers of any age may be entitled to the full range of social security benefits depending on their individual circumstances. The most common benefits for carers of pensionable age are carer's allowance, retirement pension and pension credit. Many carers reaching pension age who are entitled to carer's allowance are also entitled to a retirement pension of an equal or higher amount. In these circumstances the overlapping benefits rules preclude the payment of carer's allowance. However, entitlement to carer's allowance is retained, allowing for extra help to be given to those entitled to pension credit.

Children

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on progress in implementing the Children Matter Task Force report which initiated the process of increasing and banding the range of children provision. [188469]

Angela Smith: The programme of capital developments set out in the "Report of the Children Matter Task Force Phase 1 2001–03", has led to the development of an additional 77 residential child care places. When phase 1 is completed in 2005, 82 additional and 73 replacement residential child care places will have been provided. This will exceed the initial target of 77 new and 70 replacement places. It is anticipated that phase 2 of the Children Matter Task Force, will see the development of 49 new and 131 replacement residential child care places.

Departmental Recycling

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the latest available 12 month figures are for the proportion of the Department's redundant documentation, waste paper and card that is recycled; and if he will make a statement on the Department's recycling policy. [188693]

Angela Smith: The most recent figures available for Northern Ireland Government Departments, which show the proportion of redundant paper and cardboard that is recycled are for 2002–03. A total of 1,270 tonnes of waste paper was collected of which some 1,143 tonnes were recycled. This equates to 90 per cent. of the collected waste paper. The remaining 127 tonnes, which were unsuitable for recycling, were used as "fibre fuel" and therefore classed as being thermally recycled. There are no figures available for an overall paper recycling rate.

The volume of cardboard collected during this time was negligible, at less than 10 tonnes per annum.

The Northern Ireland Waste Management Strategy, published in 2000 and currently under review, informs Government's waste management policy to encourage the sustainable management of resources in the NI economy.

Driving Tests

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many driving tests have been performed in Northern Ireland in each year since 1997. [188879]

Angela Smith: The number of driving tests carried out by the Driver and Vehicle Testing Agency in each financial year from 1997–98 to 2003–04 is set out in the following table:

	Number
1997–98	41,864
1998–99	42,953
1999–2000	41,607
2000–01	44,359
2001–02	48,583
2002–03	48,359
2003–04	51,867

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the average waiting time is in Northern Ireland for people applying to take a driving test. [188880]

Angela Smith: The average waiting time for a driving test appointment in Northern Ireland is currently 33 calendar days.

Ebrington Primary School

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he will announce the commencement date for the building of the new Ebrington primary school in Londonderry. [190818]

Mr. Gardiner: Schools competing for capital funds are prioritised based on educational need. Although Ebrington primary school was one of a number of schools that could not be accommodated in my Department's 2004 Capital Programme it will form part of the rolling programme of investment envisaged for the schools' estate. The Western Education and Library Board placed it eleventh on its own priority list for funding in 2003. At this stage, it is not possible to give a commencement date for when building on the new school for Ebrington primary school will start.

Endoscopes

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will introduce the use of disposable endoscopes into NHS hospitals. [187851]

Angela Smith: Single-use flexible endoscopes are not currently available on the market. There are some single-use surgical rigid telescopes available but they have not been accepted in the HPSS due to the available optical quality and because rigid endoscopes are relatively simple to decontaminate compared to flexible endoscopes. The Department has recommended that the HPSS use single-use endoscope accessories where practicable.

Farm Payments

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland pursuant to the answer of 3 September 2004, Official Report, column 1481W, on farm payments, whether 96.14 per cent. of the total subsidy scheme expenditure had been paid before 30 September. [190533]

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many and what value of subsidy payments to farmers in the South Down area are outstanding. [190534]

Mr. Pearson: The Department for Agriculture and Rural Development does not hold subsidy claim details on a constituency basis. The number and potential value, if paid in full, of farm subsidy claims currently outstanding is as follows:

	Applications unpaid	Value (£ million)
Beef Special Premium	3,595	1.1
Slaughter Premium	1,706	0.6
Suckler Cow Premium	338	0.4
Extensification Payment	1,634	3

Health Service

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to reduce waiting times for people with hearing problems. [188470]

Angela Smith: Additional investment has been made in hospitals and other services here, including the allocation of an extra £8.5 million, of which £2.5 million is recurrent, to reduce waiting lists across all specialties, including ENT, in 2004–05. It is not possible to say what the specific impact will be on waiting times for people with hearing problems.

Digital hearing aids were introduced on the health service in Northern Ireland in October 2003 on a phased basis. The Department has also allocated an additional £500,000 in 2004–05 to increase the provision of digital hearing aids, and I have set a target for Health and Social Services Boards and Trusts to supply 5,000 digital hearing aids per annum by 31 March 2005. This figure will be reviewed at the end of the year and increased as appropriate.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he is taking to combat risks to patient safety arising from parallel trade in medicines in Northern Ireland. [188497]

Angela Smith: Under the European Directives on free trade, operating within the European Union, a medicine that has a marketing authorisation in another European country, subject to certain requirements, may be legally imported into the UK and supplied to patients. This is known as parallel importing and involves a rigorous regulatory framework that assures the safety, quality and efficacy of the medicine. Each medicine must have a Parallel Importation Product Licence (PIPL) issued by the Medicines and Healthcare Products Regulatory Agency (MHRA) before it can be offered for sale by a UK pharmaceutical wholesaler and supplied through a registered community pharmacy.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what estimate he has made of the number of extra consultants which would be required if the consultant contract was accepted in the Province's hospitals. [188528]

Angela Smith: The new consultant contract has been accepted by the consultant workforce in Northern Ireland and is now being implemented throughout the HPSS subject to job plans being agreed locally between management and individual consultants. Information being gathered as part of the implementation process will identify where service gaps and pressures exist and will inform the medical workforce planning process. At present, it is too early to make any estimate of the numbers of additional consultant posts that might be required.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on how the £12 million reallocated to health in August will be used. [188529]

Angela Smith: Some £6 million has been made available non-recurrently to DHSSPS in August to support HPSS winter planning initiatives, such as reducing the number of trolley waits in accident and emergency, and boosting capacity through short-term community and primary care schemes to facilitate early discharge from hospital.

In addition, some £6 million has been made available to support initiatives to reduce waiting lists and address other regional priorities such as the provision of Anti-TNF drugs.

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what resources were allocated to the training of operating department practitioners within the Health Service in Northern Ireland in the last year for which figures are available. [188849]

Angela Smith: Training of operating department practitioners is a matter for individual trusts based on the identified need within their area. Information is not held centrally on resources allocated to such training.

Housing Executive Assessments

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Housing Executive grant assessments are outstanding in the South Down Area. [190535]

Mr. Spellar: The information is not available in the format requested. Information relating to grant enquiries is held on a district council area basis. The South Down area is covered by three council areas and at 30 September 2004 the Housing Executive had registered a total of 996 inquiries for grant aid where inspections have not yet been carried out. The figures for each area are as follows:

	Number
Banbridge council area	136
Newry and Mourne council area	444
Down council area	416

Housing Relocation (Intimidation)

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the use of alternative agencies to verify cases of intimidation for purposes of housing relocation. [190536]

Mr. Spellar: In order to verify cases of intimidation, the Northern Ireland Housing Executive will, in the first instance, contact the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) to confirm whether, on the basis of their knowledge of a particular case, an applicant has been or is being intimidated from their home. Where the PSNI have no knowledge of intimidation, and an applicant is reluctant to make contact with them, the Housing Executive may seek information from "Base 2", a project operated by the EXTERN voluntary organization, or from agencies such as Health Trusts, Social Services or from individuals.

In all cases the final decision as to whether an applicant is at risk by remaining in their home rests with the Housing Executive.

Identity Cards

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what his policy is on the introduction of an identity card scheme in Northern Ireland. [190702]

Mr. Spellar: The draft Identity Cards Bill (published 26 April) set out the legal framework for the introduction of identity cards throughout the United Kingdom

Investment Projects

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much was spent in the parliamentary constituencies of (a) North, (b) South, (c) East and (d) West Belfast on each investment project sponsored by the Industrial Development Board and Invest NI in the years 1990 to 2004; what the estimate was of the number of jobs that would be created by each project; how many jobs were created by each project; and how many of these jobs have subsequently been lost. [190180]

Mr. Gardiner: The Question asked by my hon. Friend seeks information on each investment project assisted during the period 1990–2004. This level of detail could be provided only at disproportionate cost. For this reason and for ease of reference the answer presents a general analysis of investment activity in the four constituencies. The question also requests information for the period 1990–2004. However, data in the format required is only available for the period commencing 1995.

Table 1: Projects by Constituency 1995–2004

Table 1 provides details of projects supported by the Industrial Development Board (IDE) since 1995, and of those larger projects assisted by Invest NI since 2002. The answer is restricted to larger projects supported by Invest NI to ensure consistency with historical IDE data. Larger projects are those provided with offers worth more than £100,000.

Table 2: Employment Change 1995–2004

Table 2 presents a net employment figure at 2003–04, taking into account job losses from the base year to 2003–04. As shown within Table 2 there were 13,048 jobs in existence within these businesses at the time of assistance (base year). The table also details the number of jobs expected to be created (17,189). The net change within this group to 2004 is therefore 4,685.

However, it should be noted that since it takes a number of years for each project to reach maturity, those assisted within the last four years are unlikely to have yet met their full employment creation potential. Therefore, the job creation arising from these projects, which account for 5,530 of the jobs promoted, will not be fully reflected within this analysis.

Londonderry Airport

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he will announce his response to the request from the city council in Londonderry regarding financial assistance to develop Londonderry airport. [190817]

Mr. Spellar: A steering group set up by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and chaired by the council's Chief Executive is currently considering a range of technical, legal, economic and financial issues regarding the funding application. I hope that it will report shortly so that a decision can then be made.

Meat/Poultry Products

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which countries have a ban on imports of meat or poultry products from the province; and what representations he has made to have each ban lifted. [190919]

Mr. Pearson: Currently some 86 countries have a ban on beef imports from the United Kingdom and the position in relation to another 27 countries has still to be confirmed. In addition, I understand that India also has a worldwide ban on imports of poultry meat. Controls for trade with countries outside the United Kingdom is a reserved matter under the Northern Ireland Act 1998. However, officials in the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development are in regular contact with the Department of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, which has responsibility on this matter for the United Kingdom. These contacts follow liaison with exporters with the mutual aim of maximising exports of meat and poultry products from Northern Ireland.

MOT Tests

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people are employed in carrying out MOT tests in Northern Ireland. [188914]

Angela Smith: The Driver and Vehicle Testing Agency currently has 194 full-time equivalent staff directly involved in carrying out vehicle inspections.

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the average waiting time for an MOT test in Northern Ireland is from the time of application to the test being carried out. [188915]

Angela Smith: The average waiting time for vehicl tests in Northern Ireland, including MOT appointments, is currently 63 calendar days.

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much money is allocated to running each MOT centre in Northern Ireland in the current year. [188916]

Angela Smith: The Driver and Vehicle Testing Agency manages the test centre budget centrally, so specific allocations have not been made to each centre in the current year. However, the direct running costs for 2003–04 are as follows:

Test centre	£
Armagh	626,393
Ballymena	1,070,215

National Sports Stadium

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to make an announcement regarding the construction of a new national sports stadium for Northern Ireland. [188733]

Angela Smith: Following the completion of a business planning exercise commissioned by the Strategic Investment Board (SIB) into the viability of a multi-sports stadium for Northern Ireland. The SIB was asked last May to investigate site and funding options. I expect to have a report on the outcome of this exercise within a few weeks and, once this has been formally considered, an announcement on the next stage in the process will be made.

National Insurance Numbers

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the (a) target and (b) average processing time is from receipt of application to delivery of notification for persons applying for a national insurance number where the applicant holds a passport that is (i) British, (ii) Irish, (iii) other EU and (iv) non-EU; and how many complaints about delays he has received in the past 12 months. [190181]

Mr. Spellar: There is currently no target for the processing of national insurance number applications in Northern Ireland. (GB has a processing target of 86 per cent. within 24 days.)

There are three application centres located at Shaftesbury Square, Lisnagelvin and Portadown Jobs and Benefits Offices which feed into one allocation centre, located at Portadown Jobs and Benefits Office. Processing times from receipt of application to delivery of notification are as follows:

Shaftesbury Square 29 days;
Lisnagelvin 39 days;
Portadown 55 days.

These cannot be broken down into different passport holder types.

Three formal complaints are recorded as having been received in Northern Ireland Offices in the past 12 months.

Overseas Nurses

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assistance is given to overseas nurses seeking accommodation in the Province while working there, with particular reference to those from outside the European Union. [188673]

Angela Smith: The issue of assistance in seeking accommodation for overseas nurses is a matter for individual Trusts. There are a variety of arrangements in place ranging from the provision of Trust accommodation to the identification of suitable private or Housing Executive accommodation.

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for how many new residential dwellings planning permission was given in (a) Moira, (b) Aghalee, (c) Magheralin, (d) Dollingstown, (e) Donaghacloney, (f) Waringston, (g) Maghaberry and (h) Aghagallon in each of the last 15 years. [187955]

Angela Smith: I regret that this information is not available in the format requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

PWS Ireland

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much grant aid has been awarded to the company PWS Ireland in each year for the past 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [190133]

Mr. Gardiner: Over the past 10 years, PWS Ireland Ltd has received the following support from Invest NI (these figures include support offered by Local Enterprise Development Unit one of Invest NI's predecessor agencies).

Scientific Officers (Promotion)

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what independent assessment has been made of the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development's promotion boards for scientific officers. [190381]

Mr. Pearson: The Department of Agriculture and Rural Development's promotion boards for scientific officers are operated under the general arrangements that apply to the conduct of internal promotion boards across the Northern Ireland Civil Service. By agreement with Trade Union Side, these promotion boards are conducted on the basis of three separate scientific disciplines: biology, chemistry and microbiology; and candidates, subject to their qualifications and experience, can self-nominate to be considered for promotion in one or more of these disciplines.

The outcome and recommendations of promotion boards generally are not subject to separate independent scrutiny. In its general administration of the promotion process, however, the Department's Personnel Division carries out a review of all promotion board documentation to ensure compliance with the requirements of the process and mathematical accuracy of the scoring applied. These aspects are also subject to periodic checks through the internal audit process.

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what relative weighting is given by the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development's promotion boards for scientific officer positions to applicants who have previous scientific experience. [190383]

Mr. Pearson: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave on 13 October 2004, Official Report, column 314W, for details of the last promotion board for scientific officer positions.

The key selection criteria against which candidates were assessed for promotion by the board, the weightings and pass marks as determined by the panel members were as follows:

Key criteria	Weighting	Pass mark
Services	20	—
Resources	20	—
People	30	15
Information/Communication	30	15
Professional/Specialist/Technical Knowledge and Skills	50	30

Any candidate failing to reach the minimum standard of 30 marks at interview for the Professional/Specialist/ Technical Knowledge and Skills criterion was deemed unsuitable for promotion regardless of how well they performed against the remaining criteria.

Self-harm

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many episodes of self-harm there were in each health trust area in each of the last three years. [188675]

Angela Smith: Information on the total number of episodes of self-harm is not available. However, information is available on the number of episodes of self-harm resulting in admission to acute hospitals in Northern Ireland.

The following table provides figures on the number of admissions to hospitals in each trust area in Northern Ireland as a result of self-harm for each year from 2000–01 to 2002–03 (the latest year for which the data is available).

TK-ECC Plant

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which estate agent was appointed to facilitate the sale of the former TK-ECC plant in Dundonald; when the agent was appointed; when the successful offer was received; how many parties had expressed interest in the site by the date on which the deal was signed; how much the plant was sold for; and whether the buyer subsequently sold the site. [188544]

Mr. Gardiner: The TK-ECC plant at Dundonald was sold in 1995 by IDB to European Components Corporation on a freehold basis. Subsequent actions including the offering of the premises for sale are matters for the present owners of the premises.

DEFENCE

Cyprus

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which rights and benefits enjoyed by UK and Commonwealth Forces under the treaty relating to the Sovereign Base Areas in Cyprus do not extend to non-Commonwealth Forces operating on the bases; and if he will make a statement. [190429]

Mr. Ingram: The rights and benefits accorded to United Kingdom and Commonwealth Forces under the 1960 Treaty of Establishment are set out in Annex C to the treaty papers, which is effectively a Status of Forces Agreement between the UK and Republic of Cyprus (RoC) for UK and Commonwealth forces operating in and visiting the Republic. The benefits the treaty confers include: freedom of movement between the Sovereign Base Areas (SBAs) and the RoC, jurisdictional protection for certain offences committed in the RoC, exemption from RoC taxes and import duties, and the right to bear arms. Non-Commonwealth forces are not covered under these arrangements and would need to negotiate their own status of forces arrangements with the RoC.

Any Commonwealth and non-Commonwealth forces entering and operating within the SBAs who are covered by the Visiting Forces Act 1952 (which has been extended to the SBAs) are accorded generally the same rights and benefits as similar forces visiting the UK. These include jurisdictional protection and exemptions from taxes and import duties. Our ability to grant full tax and duty exemptions to non-Commonwealth forces is restricted by our treaty commitment to collect taxes, rates and fees from non-entitled persons on behalf of the RoC. Countries not covered by the Visiting Forces Act do not enjoy any privileges within the SBAs other than consent to operate within the bases and the use of SBA facilities. However, minor concessions, such as access to military messes and bars, can be agreed case-by-case for practical purposes.

Deployment

Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British service personnel are (a) deployed and (b) stationed in (i) Germany, (ii) Northern Ireland, (iii) Bosnia-Herzegovina, (iv) Croatia, (v) Kosovo, (vi) Albania, (vii) the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, (viii) Sierra Leone, (ix) the Gulf Region, (x) Turkey, (xi) Gibraltar, (xii) Belize, (xiii) Kenya, (xiv) Canada, (xv) the Falkland Islands, (xvi) Cyprus, (xvii) Brunei and (xviii) Afghanistan. [189805]

Mr. Ingram: This data is compiled from a number of sources. As at late September the approximate numbers of British service personnel deployed or stationed in the locations specified were:

Location	Deployed	Stationed
Germany	0	21,250
Northern Ireland	0	11,180
Bosnia-Herzegovina	720	0
Croatia	0	0
FYR of Macedonia	10	0
Sierra Leone	20	0
The Gulf Region	9,070	0

All figures rounded to the nearest 10.

The figures in the table do not include personnel serving in loan and diplomatic posts or on training detachments.

HMS Grimsby

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the incident involving HMS Grimsby in the Thames, close to Tilbury on 29 September when a rating fell overboard as the vessel collided with other craft. [190239]

Mr. Ingram: HMS Grimsby was undertaking routine survey work in the River Thames. She suffered a problem with her propulsion system while preparing to rescue a crew member who had fallen overboard, and struck two civilian vessels that were alongside a jetty. Neither of the two civilian vessels had people on board and there were no Royal Navy casualties.

The crew member was recovered unharmed by an RNLI rescue boat from Gravesend.

Hurricane Ivan

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the role of the UK armed forces in helping survivors of Hurricane Ivan. [191659]

Mr. Ingram: In recent weeks, the United Kingdom armed forces have provided significant emergency humanitarian assistance in the Caribbean following Hurricane Ivan. The personnel of the Royal Navy frigate HMS Richmond and the Royal Fleet Auxiliary Wave Ruler provided emergency humanitarian assistance for Grenada and the Cayman Islands.

Emergency assistance was provided with communications, essential infrastructure, damage assessment, medical support and food distribution. The Royal Navy's role in the aftermath of natural disasters that afflict the region is to provide immediate assistance until such time as full scale humanitarian relief can arrive and the civilian rebuilding effort can begin.

In support of reconstruction efforts on the Cayman Islands, the RAF also supported a deployment from the Bermuda Defence Force with a C-130 aircraft.

As the hurricane season continues, HMS Richmond and RFA Wave Ruler remain in the region, ready to respond in the event of another humanitarian crisis.

Sudan

Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the numbers of armed forces personnel HM Government will commit to the United Nations monitoring force in Sudan during the six-year interim period; and if he will make a statement. [189546]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 4 October 2004, Official Report, column 1891W, to the hon. Member for Guildford (Sue Doughty).

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Education Maintenance Allowances

Mr. Challen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many applications there have been for education maintenance allowances for the academic year 2004–05 in the Morley and Rothwell constituency; and how many have commenced payment. [190808]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Information on the number of young people who have applied, enrolled and been paid EMA is available at local authority level. By the end of September 2,557 young people in the Leeds local authority area were enrolled for EMA by their school or college, with 2,281 having received an EMA payment. The Assessment and Payment Body is currently turning around correctly completed applications within 10 working days and 3,682 young people in Leeds have now received a Notice of Entitlement to EMA. By the end of September 5,994 young people had applied for EMA from the Leeds local authority area, and of these just over a quarter had applied in September. Incorrect applications are returned to the applicant, some of whom will be ineligible for EMA, while others may have decided to enter full-time work or work based learning. We expect the number of young people receiving EMA to increase over the next few weeks as those who applied late or whose applications needed to be returned, have their applications assessed and are enrolled for payment.

Mature Students

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what financial help his Department offers mature students wishing to study for a degree. [190261]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 11 October 2004]: Eligible full-time undergraduate students are entitled in 2004/05 to income assessed grants for fees (up to £1,150) and HE grants (up to £1,000); and if aged under 50, or between 50 and 54 and planning to work after their course, to student loans (up to £5,050 in London) with 25 per cent. of the loan income assessed. While the rates are the same as for younger students, mature students benefit disproportionately because the income assessed for independent students is normally lower and more get the higher levels of support. For example, we expect around a third of all those getting the full HE grant to be independent students, although such students make up only around 15 per cent. of the total student population.

For students with dependants, additional grants include adult dependants grant (worth up to £2,335), Parents Learning Allowance (worth up to £1,330) and a Childcare Grant (worth up to £8,840). As the grants are targeted at students with dependants the main beneficiaries are mature students.

Part-time undergraduate students of any age, and this will include many mature students, may receive income assessed fee grants of up to £575 and course grants of up to £250.

In addition, student parents are eligible to receive Child Tax Credit from the Inland Revenue and disabled students are eligible for DfES disabled students allowances which are not income assessed. Students may also receive additional financial assistance through the Access to Learning Fund, which is funded by the Department and administered by institutions. Priority groups for payments from the fund include student parents and other full-time mature students (especially those with existing financial commitments).

Pupil Data Registration

Mr. Forth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills whether the advice to schools on the TeacherNet website of 20 July regarding use of wireless technologies for pupil data registration and registering of licences is mandatory; and whether liability rests with (a) the Department and (b) schools. [R] [190291]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The advice to schools regarding the use of wireless technologies for pupil data registration and the necessity of licences under UK patent EP(GB) 0 664 061 on the TeacherNet website dated 20 July 2004 is just that, advice, and therefore not mandatory. The advice highlights the issue by setting out my Department's interpretation of the judgment in the High Court of Justice, Chancery Division, Patent Court dated 17 June 2004.

In common with all products and services, schools are liable for the consequences of their procurement decisions. Before making such decisions, schools are able to seek detailed advice from their relevant service or product supplier, or whoever provides their technical advice, such as their local education authority.

Skill Training

Adam Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many adults have achieved Basic Skills Level in each year since 2001 for which figures are available. [190667]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: "Skills for Life" caters for the literacy and numeracy skills needs of post 16 learners, that is those who are no longer in compulsory education. The national strategy has an initial target to improve the skills of 750,000 adults in England by 2004, with the commitment to improve the skills of 1.5 million adults by 2007 and 2.25 million adults by 2010. Individuals count towards the target if they improve their skills evidenced by achieving a relevant national qualification, including Key Skills in Communication and Application of Number at Levels 1 and 2, and GCSEs in English and Maths.

The following table shows available data on adult learners achieving Skills for Life qualifications between the launch of the strategy in April 2001 to July 2003. Data for 2003–04 are not yet available.

Learners achieving Skills for Life qualifications in England to 2002/03 through LSC funded FE providers, Prison Service and Jobcentre Plus

	Annual achievements (thousand)
April 2001—July 2001[1]	150
August 2001—July 2002	204
August 2002—July 2003	196

PRIME MINISTER

Ministerial Spouses (Security)

Norman Baker: To ask the Prime Minister what rules govern the public provision of security support for relatives of Ministers when such persons are abroad on personal trips. [191184]

The Prime Minister: It has been the practice of successive governments not to comment on security issues.

TRANSPORT

Access for All Fund

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the budget for the Access for All fund is, broken down by rail region; and if he will list the criteria for prioritising its distribution. [190219]

Mr. McNulty: Planned Government expenditure on rail for the next three years will be published in due course. The Strategic Rail Authority expects to consult on a Disability Strategy by the end of this year. The consultation document will propose criteria for prioritising the Access for All fund.

Rail Use

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what assessment has been made of the accuracy of figures for rail use; and whether this takes account of non-payment of fares; [191116]

(2) what plans he has to discuss non-payment of rail fares; and what account is taken of non-payment of fares in planning for future rail use, including the expansion of services; [191117]

(3) how many rail users there were on the Cheltenham to London service in the last period for which figures are available; and what estimate has been made of leakage of usage arising from non-payment of fares. [191129]

Mr. McNulty: The calculation of rail use by passengers does not take account of ticketless travel as it is based on the numbers of tickets sold. In the year to 18 September 2004, figures provided by First Great Western show that there were 191,006 passenger journeys between Cheltenham and London terminals. It is estimated that the fares evasion level on the network is between 3 per cent. and 7 per cent. overall.

The Government are currently engaged in a consultation on ticketless travel and the penalty fare level. The consultation period ends on 26 October.

Renewable Transport Fuels

Mrs. Shephard: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends to introduce a renewable transport fuels obligation under the Energy Act 2004. [190815]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 14 October 2004]: No decision has yet been taken on whether the Government should introduce any form of renewable transport fuels obligation. It is one of a number of policy options which the Government is currently considering as a way of supporting the development and use of biofuels in the UK. Before introducing any obligation, the Government would consult extensively on how it might operate.

Rolling Stock (Fenchurch Street)

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will instruct the Strategic Rail Authority to withhold permission for further removals of rolling stock from the Fenchurch street line. [190746]

Mr. McNulty: The Strategic Rail Authority, working with the rail industry, must have the ability to make decisions on the best deployment of rolling stock across the whole network. However there are currently no plans for any further re-deployment of rolling stock from the Fenchurch street line.

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions the Strategic Rail Authority has had with c2c about the removal of rolling stock from the Fenchurch Street line; and what approvals they have given to c2c. [190747]

Mr. McNulty: I refer the hon. Member to the written reply given to him on 13 September 2004, Official Report, column 1383W.

CDC

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development pursuant to his answer of 3 March 2004, Official Report, column 916W, on CDC, what proportion of CDC-funded travel involved an overnight stay in each year since 1999. [190514]

Hilary Benn: CDC does not keep a record of this information, and to obtain it would incur a disproportionate cost.

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will list CDC/Actis Capital funded agribusiness (a) new investments and (b) disposals since June 2003 broken down by (i) country, (ii) investment fund and (iii) investment size. [190515]

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will list non-CDC third-party capital under Actis Capital's management broken down by (a) investor, (b) country, (c) investment fund and (d) amount. [190516]

Hilary Benn: The following table sets out the various Actis funds and details (by fund), the country/region, the size of the fund, the number of non-CDC investors and the percentage investment in each fund by them.

The amounts invested by non-CDC third party investors are confidential and is commercially sensitive and are therefore confidential.

Dr. Ladyman: The information requested is not collected centrally. Allocations of funding for particular treatments are matters for the local primary care trust.

Chiropody

Sandra Gidley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice he gives to primary care trusts concerning the length of time a patient should wait between regular chiropody appointments. [190138]

Mr. Hutton: No advice has been given. This is a matter for clinicians to address at a local level.

Cleaning Contracts

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list hospitals in England whose primary cleaning contract is performed by in-house staff. [189438]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested has been placed in the Library. The data provided was collected during the 2003–04 patient environment action team (PEAT) programme. It lists 706 hospital sites where it was reported that cleaning was undertaken by in-house staff. Some sites reported that the responsibility for cleaning was split between in-house staff and contract cleaners and these sites are not listed as we do not hold information centrally on which is the primary contract.

The 2003–04 PEAT programme ran from December 2003 to May 2004. The arrangements for cleaning in hospitals are a matter for local managers and it is possible that some of the information provided has since changed.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made on the effects on costs of cleaning contracts to (a) hospitals in England and (b) Worthing and Southlands Hospitals Trust of rises in (i) national insurance contributions and (ii) the minimum wage. [189439]

Mr. Hutton: Information is not routinely collected or held centrally on the pay element of the costs of cleaning contracts awarded to either national health service teams or external contractors.

Clinical Excellence Awards

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the cost to the Department of (a) clinical excellence awards and (b) higher level clinical excellence awards in the last year for which figures are available. [189260]

Mr. Hutton: This is the first year of the clinical excellence awards scheme and it is not yet known how much the Department will be spending on the awards. The advisory committee on clinical excellence awards will ratify the decisions on new awards at the forthcoming meeting in October.

Last year, 2003–04, was the final year of the distinction awards scheme and the total spent by the Department on new and existing national distinction awards was £139,673,000.

Correspondence

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Torbay of 26 August regarding NHS work permits. [189650]

Mr. Hutton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Citizenship and Immigration at the Home Office (Mr. Browne) on 11 October 2004, Official Report, column 165W.

Council of Ministers

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a written ministerial statement outlining the key points on the agenda for each of the Council of Ministers' meetings at which his Department is represented in advance of each meeting. [188196]

Mr. Hutton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Straw) on 13 September 2004, Official Report, column 1451W.

Egg Freezing

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the hospital trusts which do not offer an egg freezing service to women who have a radical hysterectomy following cervical cancer. [190964]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Haemodialysis (Jersey)

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients received funding from the NHS for haemodialysis treatment in Jersey in (a) 2003–04 and (b) 2002–03. [189778]

Mr. Hutton: This information is not collected centrally. The administrative arrangements which support the Health Service Convention between the United Kingdom and the Channel Islands explicitly exclude the provision of maintenance renal dialysis treatment free of charge for temporary visitors.

Primary care trusts in England may, however, pay for treatment abroad for UK residents, but the guidelines for assumption of the costs of such treatment normally exclude holiday haemodialysis.

Healthcare Commission

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the cost was of running the Healthcare Commission in the last year for which figures are available. [189435]

Mr. Hutton: The Healthcare Commission began operating in April 2004. The budgeted expenditure for 2004–05 is £75.5 million, funded by £4 million from private and voluntary healthcare fees and £71.5 million grant in aid.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the responsibilities of the Healthcare Commission are. [189436]

Mr. Hutton: The Healthcare Commission is the independent healthcare inspectorate for England. Its functions are set out in the Health and Social Care (Community Health and Standards) Act 2003.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many reviews have been carried out by the Healthcare Commission since its inception. [189437]

Mr. Hutton: I understand from the Healthcare Commission that it has published:

33 clinical governance reviews of national health service trusts—mental health and primary care;

19 local reports on the implementation of the coronary heart disease national service framework;

one investigation;

34 inspection reports on private and voluntary providers.

Hepatitis C

Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department is taking to assess the prevalence of hepatitis C in the UK population. [189820]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 11 October 2004, Official Report, column 144W.

The prevalence of hepatitis C in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland is a matter for the respective devolved administrations.

Hospital Closures

Mr. Boris Johnson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) community hospitals and (b) disabled units in England and Wales have closed since 1997. [190216]

Mr. Hutton: Information on hospital closures, including specialist units, ceased to be collected in 1991 following the introduction of the national health service internal market and NHS trusts.

Life Expectancy

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 9 September 2004, Official Report, column 1354W, on life expectancy, what the baseline is for progress against the detailed target for life expectancy; and what progress has been made towards meeting the target. [189879]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The detailed life expectancy target is:

> "Starting with local authorities, by 2010 to reduce by at least 10 per cent. the gap between the fifth of areas with the "worst health and deprivation indicators' and the population as a whole."

The baseline is the average life expectancy at birth, for males and females separately, for the three years 1995, 1996 and 1997, for the group of local authority (LA) areas identified as having the "worst health and deprivation indicators". This group of areas is identified as the LAs that are in the worst quintile for at least three of the following variables:

male life expectancy at birth;

female life expectancy at birth;

cancer mortality in under 75s;

circulatory disease mortality in under 75s;

deprivation, as measured by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's index of multiple deprivation 2004, average ward scores.

We are awaiting publication of the revised data for these variables and will be able to report on progress against the target on a robust basis following publication of these data.

Malaria (Malavane)

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make Malavane available on the NHS as an anti-malaria treatment; and if he will make a statement. [191351]

Mr. Hutton: There is no drug called Malavane. The anti-malarial drug Malarone is not available on the national health service. Regulation 24, Schedule 5(1) of the national health services (General Medical Services Contracts) Regulations 2004, states that general practitioners can charge patients for > "prescribing or providing drugs or medicines for malaria chemoprophylaxis".

National Service Framework for Older People

Paul Holmes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funding has been allocated to (a) primary care trusts and (b) strategic health authorities for the implementation of Standard Five of the National Service Framework for Older People; and if he will make a statement. [190575]

Dr. Ladyman: We do not allocate resources specifically for implementing the national service framework for older people or the development of particular services, such as stroke services. This allows local national health service commissioners and providers to plan and deliver services according to the needs of the local population.

For the period 2003–04 to 2007–08, expenditure on the NHS in England will increase on average by 7.2 per cent., a year over and above inflation. Older people, the biggest users of the NHS, will be among the principal beneficiaries.

NHS Bureaucracy

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the cost to the NHS of all central returns of information and statistics to (a) the Department of Health and (b) the Department's arm's length bodies in the last 12 months for which figures are available. [187858]

Miss Melanie Johnson: To discharge public accountability for the about £69.4 billion spent on the national health service in 2004–05, the Department will require certain information and statistics. By the end of the year, it will take the equivalent of about 400 NHS administrative and clerical staff, out of a total 1.3 million NHS staff, to provide this information to the Department. This represents a significant reduction in the burden as a result of improving the systems for collecting information.

Similar information is not available in respect of the Department's arm's length bodies but, as was announced in July, the number of these bodies is being reduced and arrangements are being put in place to reduce their capacity to impose demands on the NHS frontline.

NHS Cleaning

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much the NHS spent on cleaning its (a) premises and (b) equipment in the latest year for which figures are available. [189255]

Mr. Hutton: In 2002–03, the national health service spent a total of £460 million on domestic cleaning services. The figure includes pay and non-pay costs, for example, the cost of contract staff, fees, materials, equipment provision and uniform costs. Information on the amount spent on cleaning premises and equipment is not collected separately.

NHS Contracts (Auctions)

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what percentage of auctions for contracting work in the NHS have been cancelled owing to lack of significant bidders; [R] [190038]

(2) what assessment he has made of the use of auctions for contracting work in the NHS; [190039]

(3) how many eAuctions have been undertaken in the NHS in each of the last two years. [R] [190040]

Mr. Hutton: No eAuctions undertaken by the National Health Service Purchasing and Supply Agency (NHS PASA) have been cancelled due to lack of supplier participation.

NHS PASA undertook a pilot study of eAuctions during 2003–04, in which 13 eAuction events were completed. A report on our assessment of this pilot is available on the NHS PASA website.

There is no central record of eAuction events undertaken by NHS organisations. NHS PASA itself undertook one eAuction event during 2002–03 and 13 eAuction events during 2003–04.

NHS Nurses

Mr. Cameron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many nurses left the NHS in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [190032]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is not collected centrally. The Department's non-medical workforce census collects information on the number of nurses employed in the national health service each year; consecutive years' data therefore show the net change in the workforce, taking account of leavers and joiners.

The Nursing and Midwifery Council (NMC) publishes an annual statistical report which includes information about the number of nurses and midwives leaving the register. This data can be found on the NMC website at www.nmc-uk.org.uk.

Between September 1997 and March 2004, there has been a net increase in the number of nurses employed in the NHS of 77,500. The Government have met and exceeded the NHS Plan and Manifesto targets for increasing the nursing workforce and has also exceeded the expectation for 35,000 more nurses by 2008. The Government acknowledge that there are still more staff needed in these areas and we shall focus on increasing training places, retaining nursing staff and filling existing vacancies.

Primary Care Trusts

Mr. Baron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to reduce the number of primary care trusts. [191754]

Mr. Hutton: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, presently has no plans to reduce the number of primary care trusts.

Reconfiguration Service Reviews

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many reconfiguration service reviews have been undertaken by Sir Ara Darzi, broken down by (a) date and (b) services covered. [189263]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 16 September 2004]: Professor Sir Ara Darzi has undertaken or is undertaking the following service reviews:

Review	Date	Services covered
Kidderminster hospital	June-July 2001	Elective surgery
Worcestershire, County Durham and Darlington	December 2001–February 2002	All acute services
Hartlepool hospital	Under way	All acute services

Residential Care

Jim Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much his Department has paid towards nursing costs for those in residential care in the past 12 months; and what proportion this represents of the total amount spent on residential care from all sources. [189002]

Dr. Ladyman: The total amount spent in 2002–03, the latest year for which figures are available, by councils and primary care trusts (PCTs) in providing nursing care for adults was £1.95 billion. In that year, PCTs were allocated £220 million to meet the assessed nursing needs of people in care homes providing nursing care. This was to cover the nursing care costs of people who met the full cost of their care. The corresponding costs for people financially supported by councils is not separately identifiable. Thus, a valid comparison cannot be made.

In 2003–04, PCTs became responsible for the nursing care costs of all residents in homes providing nursing care. PCTs were allocated £584 million for this purpose. The total amount spent by councils and PCTs in that year is not yet available to make a comparison.

We would expect this to be about 25 to 30 per cent. of the amount spent on residential care. The balance comprises principally the costs of personal care provided to residents and their board and lodging costs.

Sexually Transmitted Diseases

Sarah Teather: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of diagnosed sexually transmitted diseases there were in each primary care trust in London in each year since 1997. [190478]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The numbers of cases of diagnosed sexually transmitted diseases for each primary care trust in London for each year since 1997 are shown in the table.

Short Gestation Births

Dr. Vis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children were born at under 24 weeks gestation in the last two years for which figures are available; how many were still alive one year later; how many were handicapped; and from what handicaps they suffered. [190167]

Dr. Ladyman: The Department estimates that 450 babies were born from 400 deliveries before 24 weeks gestation in 2001–02. In 2002–03, about 600 babies were born from around 650 similar deliveries. Deliveries at low gestational age are often, but not always, precursors to disability. We do not have any information on the number of babies born in the most recent years who have physical or sensory impairments or learning difficulties. Neither do we know how many of those babies were still alive a year after birth. However, results of a United Kingdom and Ireland longitudinal study conducted at Nottingham University based on babies born before 26 weeks in the nine months from March to December 1995 is available at http://www.nottingham.ac.uk/human-development/EPICure/study2.htm .

Social Services Expenditure

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average expenditure per head of population on (a) children and (b) older people was by each social services department in the last year for which figures are available. [191120]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The table shows the average gross expenditure per head of population on children and older people for each social services department in England in 2002–03, the latest year for which data are available.

Vegan Food Products

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to encourage the food industry to use the Vegan Society's sunflower logo on food products complying with vegan standards; and if he will make a statement. [190137]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Vegan Society's sunflower logo is a registered trademark used for commercial purposes and as such, it is not appropriate for the Government to encourage its use.

Working Time Directive

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received about the costs of remunerating medical staff who have signed a formal opt-out from the Working Time Directive. [186366]

Mr. Hutton: I am not aware of any such representations.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Pensions

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the procedures for dealing with persons applying or the enhanced or accelerated pension administered by the Northern Ireland Local Government Officers Superannuation Committee have been revised in the past five years. [191634]

Angela Smith: The pension scheme administered by the Northern Ireland Local Government Officers' Superannuation Committee does not make provision for an accelerated or an enhanced pension arrangement. The Local Government Pension Scheme Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002, Part III, which came into operation on 1 February 2003, did, however, make provision for optional additional benefits. One of which was to allow employing authorities to increase total membership (the number of years which count for pension purposes) of members leaving employment at or after 50. It is the responsibility of each employing authority to formulate and review their policy in respect of Part III of those Regulations.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Benefits (York)

Hugh Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many and what percentage of (a) men, (b) women and (c) men and women were (i) unemployed and claiming benefits, (ii) long-term unemployed, (iii) youths unemployed and (iv) claiming incapacity benefit or predecessor invalidity benefits in (A) the UK, (B) England, (C) Yorkshire and the Humber, (D) City of York Council area and (E) City of York and York parliamentary constituency in each year since 1979. [188955]

Jane Kennedy: The available information has been placed in the Library.

Civil Service (Job Losses)

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions which services within his Department will be (a) affected by and (b) subject to job losses consequent on the cuts in the civil service announced in the Spending Review. [189641]

Maria Eagle: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 16 September 2004, Official Report, column 1659W

Consultants

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how much his Department spent on (a) headhunters and recruitment consultants and (b) management consultants in (i) 1996–97 and (ii) the latest year for which figures are available. [185531]

Maria Eagle: DWP was formed in June 2001 from the former Department of Social Security (DSS) and parts of the former Department for Education and Employment (DfEE) including the Employment Service (ES). Consultancy procurement prior to the formation of DWP was the responsibility of the individual Agencies within DSS and DfES. The information requested was not collated centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

During 2003–04, DWP spent £0.71 million on headhunters and recruitment consultants. During 2002–03, the latest year for which figures are available, expenditure on management consultancy was £47.57 million.

Headed Notepaper

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what the total cost of printing departmental headed notepaper was in (a) 1996–97 and (b) the latest year for which figures are available. [185527]

Maria Eagle: In 2003–04, the latest year available, the Department for Work and Pensions spent £425,219 on headed notepaper. Headed notepaper is used for most external communications with our customers, who include most of the UK population, our suppliers and business contacts. Because the Department was formed in 2001 there are no comparable figures for 1996–07. Figures for 1996–07 for the Department's predecessor organisations, principally the Department of Social Security and the Employment Service agency are not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

LandSecurities Trillium

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what the projected annual costs of his Department's contract payments to LandSecurities Trillium are. [189417]

Maria Eagle: The total projected contract payment to LandSecurities Trillium for 2004–05 is £482.3 million.

Pension Payment Arrangements

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pensioners have opted for a (a) Post Office and (b) bank or building society account for the receipt of pension payments; and how many have still to make their preference known. [190286]

Mr. Pond [holding answer 13 October 2004]: As at 20 August we had written to almost 5.4 million pensioners. Almost 2 million have provided their bank account details, and almost 2.5 million have requested a Post Office card account.

Those customers who have not yet provided their account details will be contacted again to discuss their options, unless they have already advised the Department that they genuinely cannot open or manage an account.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Green Ministers

Mr. Horam: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many meetings of the Ministerial Sub-Committee of Green Ministers were attended by the Department's Green Minister in (a) 2002–03 and (b) 2003–04. [190850]

Estelle Morris: According to Cabinet Committee protocol, I can confirm only that I have represented the Department for Culture, Media and Sport on this committee since July 2003.

Television Licences

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will estimate the percentage of households in each of Northern Ireland's constituencies in possession of a valid television licence. [191628]

Estelle Morris: As explained in my reply to the hon. Member on 11 October 2004, Official Report, column 69W, TV Licensing do not record the numbers of licences issued by parliamentary constituency. It is therefore not possible to estimate reliably the percentage of households in each constituency in possession of a television licence.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what rights the television licensing authorities have to make pre-emptive calls upon the residents of newly built properties when there is no clarity as to whether they yet own a television; and if she will investigate correspondence issued by the authority with regard to this practice. [190210]

Estelle Morris: The BBC, as licensing authority, and its agent, TV Licensing, have the same rights and responsibilities in relation to newly built properties as in respect of any other property. Parliament has entrusted the administration of the television licensing system to the BBC and the Government have no power to intervene in operational matters of this kind. However, the BBC has explained that TV Licensing receives regular updates of the Postal Address File maintained by the Post Office. This information is checked against licensing data and, if an unlicensed property is identified, inquiries are made first by letter, then by telephone and if necessary by a home visit to establish if a television licence is required.

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many households in the city of Glasgow are in receipt of the free television licence for over-75s. [191004]

Estelle Morris: TV Licensing, who administer free television licences for people aged 75 or over as agents for the BBC, are not able to provide geographical breakdowns of the number of free licences issued. However, 2001 Census data indicate that there are approximately 44,400 people aged 75 or over living in Glasgow.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Bovine TB

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of incidence of bovine tuberculosis in deer; and how much her Department has spent on research into this in each of the past 10 years. [190107]

Mr. Bradshaw: Bovine tuberculosis (TB) has been confirmed in five of the six established wild and feral species of deer in GB.

Defra has carried out one research project in the last 10 years which has included work on isolating TB in deer and other mammalian wildlife species (excluding badgers). The wildlife survey, carried out by the Central Science Laboratory (CSL) in the South West of England, confirmed infection in four deer species—roe deer (1.0 per cent. of 885 samples), red deer (1.0 per cent. of 196 samples), fallow deer (4.4 per cent. of 504 samples) and muntjac (5.2 per cent. of 58 samples). The prevalence of infection was significantly higher in adult fallow and roe deer. The final report of the CSL research was published on the Defra website in July and can be viewed at: http://www.defra.gov.uk/science/project_data/DocumentLibrary/SE3010/SE3010_1628_FRP.doc

A breakdown of the costs for the Central Science Laboratory research are given in the following table:

	Cost
1999–2000	104,418
2000–01	162,237
2001–02	195,822
2002–03	182,460
2003–04	117,686
Total	762,623

Note:

The CSL survey looked at TB in a number of mammalian wildlife species and did not focus specifically on deer.

While isolations of Mycobacterium bovis (the causative organism of bovine TB) from deer are a concern it is not clear what, if any, contribution any of the species examined in the study make to the problem of TB in cattle. We are currently considering the requirements for our future research programme.

Foot and Mouth Vaccine

Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many doses of foot and mouth vaccine are immediately available for the type O virus which occurred in 2001. [191745]

Mr. Bradshaw: Article 79.4 of Council Directive 2003/85/EEC on Community measures for the control of foot and mouth disease states that

> "The information on quantities and subtypes of antigens or authorised vaccines stored in the national antigen and vaccine bank shall be treated as classified information and in particular shall not be published."

Student Agricultural Workers Scheme

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the decision to exempt some non-EU students from national insurance contributions as part of the student agricultural workers scheme. [190843]

Dawn Primarolo: I have been asked to reply.

National insurance contributions fall within the remit of the Inland Revenue and I am replying as the Minister responsible. Regulation 145(3) of the Social Security (Contributions) Regulations 2001 (SI 2001/1004), which dates back to 1948, allows certain foreign students employed in the UK during their vacations to be exempt from NICs for the first 52 weeks of their employment. It does not apply to students from within the EU or countries with which the UK has a Reciprocal Agreement (RA) or Double Contribution Convention (DCC).

HOME DEPARTMENT

Airwave

Jim Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the effect on the resilience of the critical national infrastructure of a second independent national emergency service communications network operating in parallel to Airwave. [190221]

Caroline Flint: We are working with the Association of Chief Police Officers, the Association of Police Authorities, the Police Information Technology Organisation and commercial partners to increase further the resilience of Airwave. A single, resilient network has very significant cost and technical advantages over the building and operation of two independent networks.

Animal Welfare

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he was informed (a) of the death of three primates en route to Huntingdon in 1998 and (b) that the crates in which they were carried broke International Air Transport Association regulations; and if he will make a statement. [189113]

Caroline Flint: The animals were found dead on arrival at Charles de Gaulle airport in Paris from the Philippines on 5 August 1998. Their deaths were reported to Home Office Ministers on 28 August 1998. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the department responsible at that time for the enforcement of regulations governing the transportation of animals to the United Kingdom, was also informed.

Antisocial Behaviour Orders

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many anti-social behaviour orders have been issued in the Borough of Hackney; and if he will make a statement. [190129]

Ms Blears: Anti-Social behaviour orders (ASBOs) have been available to the courts since 1 April 1999. From commencement, up to 31 March 2004 (latest available), the Home Office has been notified of three ASBOs issued where restrictions imposed are specific to the Borough of Hackney.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people who have successfully claimed asylum in the last three years are paying national insurance contributions. [191296]

Dawn Primarolo: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested is not available.

Great Gorilla Run

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the cost of policing the Great Gorilla Run in London on 19 September was. [190449]

Ms Blears: The Commissioners of Police for the City of London and for the Metropolis inform me that no additional policing costs were incurred for this charity event.

The Dian Fossey Gorilla Fund organised the event and provided the majority of stewards.

Police

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the Government are doing to improve trust of the police among black people. [190136]

Ms Blears: Citizen-focused policing, a key strand of the police reform programme, is about improving the way police forces understand, communicate with and engage with their communities. Race and diversity are a key element of this.

Recent national initiatives aimed at improving public confidence in the police are the Police Race and Diversity Learning and Development Programme, which aims to help officers meet the individual needs of diverse communities, and the work of the Stop and Search Action Team which aims to increase the confidence that the black and minority ethnic (BME) community has in the way the police use the stop and search power and, where appropriate reduce disproportionality.

Tom Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) men and (b) women police officers in the Metropolitan Police force come from a minority ethnic background. [190255]

Ms Blears: I refer my hon. Friend to the recently published Home Office Statistical Bulletin on Police Service Strength 31 March 2004.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to ensure that police forces that choose not to employ community support officers do not lose out in the distribution of the Neighbourhood Policing Fund. [190305]

Ms Blears: The aim of the Neighbourhood Policing Fund (NPF) is to support the development of local policing teams to work with residents on policing priorities in their area. The NPF will enable forces to recruit 24,000 Community Support Officers (CSOs) by April 2008.

£50 million from the NPF is to be allocated to police forces in 2004–05 in to fund the salaries of new CSOs. We are expecting all 43 forces England and Wales to submit bids for funding. We will be discussing with police authorities and forces the terms of funding in subsequent years.

Police Complaints Commission

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) complaints have been received and (b) investigations were carried out by the office of the Police Complaints Commission for England and Wales in each of the last four years. [188652]

Ms Blears: It is assumed that the question refers to the Independent Police Complaints Commission (IPCC) which was established under the Police Reform Act 2002 and commenced operations on 1 April 2004. It replaced the Police Complaints Authority (PCA) which ceased operations on 31 March 2004.

A breakdown of the complaints for the years 1999–2000 to 2002–2003 are as follows.

	Total complaints received by police	Complaints referred to PCA	Complaints accepted for investigation	Voluntary referrals of non-complaint matters received	Voluntary referrals accepted by PCA
2002–03	15,248	898	447	181	133
2001–02	16,654	937	622	177	162
2000–01	18,911	946	586	125	117
1999–00	21,000	1,192	822	144	139

The powers available to the IPCC are greater than those that were available to the PCA. It can receive complaints directly rather than just by referral. It also has powers to independently investigate complaints in certain circumstances.

Prisons

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average time taken for a prisoner on the CARATS or other drug programmes to access drug treatment on leaving prison is. [190308]

Caroline Flint: Information is not available in the format requested.

The National Treatment Agency (NTA) report that by July 2004 in the majority of Drug Action Teams (DATs), there was an average waiting time of between one and a half to three and a half weeks for all types of treatment for all drug users, both those leaving prison and those entering treatment from the community. This is compared to between three to eight weeks in December 2002. The NTA is working with DATs to ensure waiting times continue to drop.

The NTA report that waiting times in the 47 DATs where the Drug Interventions Programme (formally known as CJIP) is being delivered intensively are lower than non-Drug Interventions Programme areas.

Stop and Search Powers

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were stopped and searched in Lechlade near Fairford on 22 March 2003 using powers under section 60 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994. [190778]

Caroline Flint: I understand from Gloucestershire Police that 25 people were stopped and searched in Lechlade near Fairford on 22 March 2003 using powers under section 60 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994.

Travellers

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he has given to police authorities on dealing with travellers' (a) unwanted access to (i) privately owned and (ii) publicly owned sites and (b) removal from (i) privately and (ii) publicly owned sites; and if he will make a statement. [190691]

Caroline Flint: In February 2004, the Home Office and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (ODPM) published operational guidance for the police and local authorities on managing unauthorised camping. The guidance is available on the ODPM website.

UN Convention Against Corruption

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what timescale he has for introducing the (a) primary and (b) secondary legislation that is required in order for the UK to be able to ratify the UN Convention Against Corruption. [190483]

Caroline Flint: The Government will seek to bring forward the required legislation at the earliest suitable opportunity. In addition to primary legislation to comply with Article 55 on the forfeiture of the instrumentalities of crime, secondary legislation will be required to comply with Article 52, on the prevention and detection of transfers of the proceeds of crime, and Article 53 of the Convention, on the confiscation and repatriation of assets. Measures dealing with the requirements of Article 52 are likely to be included in the EU Third Money Laundering Directive. Our current expectation is that negotiations on the Directive will be completed by the first part of next year and we would seek to implement it in the UK through secondary legislation as soon as we reasonably could thereafter.

Measures dealing with the requirements of Article 53 will be brought forward under Part 11 of the Proceeds of Crime (POCA) Act 2002.

Violent Crime

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent assessment he has made of the level of violent crime. [186549]

Ms Blears: According to figures from the British Crime Survey (BCS), which are the most reliable indicator of long-term trends in violence in England and Wales, there were an estimated 2.7 million violent incidents against adults in 2003–04. Levels of violent crime are now stable and are 26 per cent. down from 1997. The fear of violent crime has also fallen steadily since 1998, with the proportion of adults with a high level of concern about violent crime down from 21 per cent. in 2002–03 to 16 per cent. in 2003–04.

Half of all violent incidents reported to the BCS in 2003–04 did not result in injury to the victim. However, this does not mean that public concern about violent crime is unjustified or that the ordeal of victims is not traumatic, even if injury has not occurred.

Recorded violent crime has risen since 1997, reaching 1.1 million incidents in 2003–04, but these data are affected by changes in reporting and recording practices. The Home Office Counting Rules for Recorded Crime were amended in 1998 to include a large number of offences particularly in the less serious violence categories. The introduction of the National Crime Recording Standard (NCRS) in April 2002 also resulted in an increase in recorded crime. The effect for violent crime was estimated to be an increase of 20 per cent.

In addition, more violent crimes are being recorded by the police as public tolerance of violence in the family or by acquaintances diminishes. Along with a more proactive response from the police, more crimes that would have previously been unreported are now recorded in the official figures.

Violent Crime (Northampton)

Mr. Tony Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the level of violent crime in Northampton was in each year since 1997. [186416]

Ms Blears: Northampton is a Crime and Disorder Reduction Partnership (CDRP) area. Data at CDRP level has only been collected from 1999–2000 onwards. Violent crime comprises violence against the person, sexual offences and robbery. In 2003–04, at least 52 per cent. of all recorded violence against the person involved no injury.

The available information are given in the tables.

Violent crime recorded by the police in Northampton 1999–2000 to 2001–02[1]

Period	Number of offences
1999–2000	2,525
2000–01	2,656
2001–02	2,927

[1] The date in this table is prior to the introduction of the National Crime Recording Standard in April 2002. These figures are not directly comparable with those for later years.

Violent crime recorded by the police in Northampton 2002–03 to 2003–04[1]

Period	Number of offences
2002–03	4,539
2003–04	5,451

[1] The date in this table takes account of the introduction of the National Crime Recording Standard in April 2002. These figures are not directly comparable with those for earlier years.

The British Crime Survey (BCS) also provides data on the level of violent crime in England and Wales. However, due to the variability of specific offence figures at police force area level, regional figures only are available. Data at regional level has been published as a rate per 10,000 adults since the 2001–02 BCS and are presented for the relevant region in the following table.

Total BCS violence rate per 10,000 adults for the East Midlands Region

	BCS
2001–02	621
2002–03	578
2003–04	600

Note:
The apparent difference between rates in 2002–03 and in 2003–04 is not statistically significant
Source:
2001–02, 2002–03, 2003–04 BCS interviews.

Half of all violent incidents reported to the BCS during 2003–04 did not result in injury to the victim. However, this does not mean that public concern about violent crime is unjustified or that the ordeal of victims is not traumatic, even if injury has not occurred.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Parliamentary Data and Video Network

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chairman of the Information Committee what evaluation has been carried out of the effectiveness of the work undertaken by the Parliamentary Data and Video Network from a system based around Citrix to one using broadband for remote users. [189973]

Mr. Key: The majority of users are content with the Virtual Private Network (VPN) service, which in time will replace Citrix for remote access. VPN technology, which uses broadband connections, was piloted before it was launched. Feedback from the pilot was evaluated and further feedback was invited once the service had been rolled out. The Parliamentary Communications Directorate (PCD) has investigated all negative feedback and has taken steps to ensure that the problems identified have been resolved. The performance of the VPN continues to be closely monitored.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chairman of the Information Committee how many (a) complaints and (b) positive comments he has received since the system of connection to the Parliamentary Data and Video Network moved from Citrix to broadband for remote users, with particular reference to (i) access problems, (ii) speed and (iii) protection from spam. [189974]

Mr. Key: Since the introduction of the Virtual Private Network (VPN) I have received eight letters commenting on the service. Most of the letters welcome the move to broadband but also detail individual complaints. Most of the complaints relate to service issues rather than to access, speed or unsolicited e-mail. Three of the letters related to access problems in areas of the country where broadband was unavailable.

I am aware that the Parliamentary Communications Directorate has recently received complaints about the speed of the VPN. Every effort is being made to resolve this issue, and the Information Committee continues to monitor it closely.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chairman of the Information Committee how many hon. Members (a) use and (b) do not use the Parliamentary Data and Video Network. [189975]

Mr. Key: There are currently 2,253 accounts set up for Members and their staff. 1,126 of these have been used at least once. It is not possible to provide separate figures for use by Members as it is not clear how many Members allow access to their accounts by their staff.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

Parliamentary Data and Video Network

Mr. Drew: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission what the (a) budget and (b) cost of the Parliamentary Data and Video Network was in each of the last five years; and how many users had access to the systems in each of those years (i) on the parliamentary estate and (ii) as remote users. [189971]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: The current costs, budget, and number of accounts on the Parliamentary Network (PN) for the last five years are:

£000

	1999–2000	2000–01	2001–02	2002–03	2003–04
PN Budget	1,425	1,399	1,688	1,664	2,135
PN Expenditure	1,545	1,264	1,773	1,783	2,594
Accounts at year end (approx)	3,000	4,000	5,200	5,600	6,600

Budget and expenditure figures for the PN for 2003–04 reflect organisational changes to the Parliamentary Communications Directorate and are not directly comparable with earlier years.

The total number of accounts has been given because the number of individual users is not recorded. Of the total network accounts, around 2,230 are registered for Virtual Private Network (VPN) remote access and 2,730 for Citrix remote access. The numbers cannot simply be added because network accounts can be registered for both VPN and Citrix access.

Television Sets

Norman Baker: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission how many television sets are operationally available on the parliamentary estate; what hours they are preset to turn on and off for each day of the week (a) when the House is sitting and (b) during parliamentary recesses; what measures have been taken to conserve the energy that they use; and what energy consumption he estimates results each year from televisions being left in stand-by mode. [191185]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: There are 1,951 television annunciators on the parliamentary estate. When the Houses are sitting the central control switches on the sets for an average of approximately 14 hours per day. On non-sitting days the central control does not activate the sets. The annunciator sets have been selected for their low energy consumption. When a set is operating it consumes 65 watts and in standby mode the consumption is 5.5 watts. The estimated annual energy cost of all the sets when in standby mode is £2,300.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Bed-and-Breakfast Accommodation (Buckinghamshire)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many homeless households in the Buckingham constituency have been resident in bed-and-breakfast accommodation in each year since 2002; and what percentage of them claimed benefit in each year. [191070]

Keith Hill: Information is not collected at constituency level, only at local authority level. Information reported by Aylesbury Vale district council on the number of homeless households resident in bed and breakfast hotels under homelessness legislation at the end of each quarter since 2002 is given in the table. Aylesbury Vale DC comprises the entire parliamentary constituency of Buckingham, and part of Aylesbury. The number of these households claiming, or in receipt of, social security benefits is not collected centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Homeless households in B&B accommodation (inc. Shared Facility Annexes): Aylesbury Vale DC

	31 March	30 June	30 September	31 December
2002	1	4	4	0
2003	3	0	0	1
2004	1	1	—	—

Note:

ODPM P1(E) housing returns (quarterly).

Canvey Island

Bob Spink: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will make it his policy to ensure (a) that Canvey Island is provided with an additional access road before any further major housing or industrial development is undertaken and (b) that the East of England Development Agency invests in additional access roads in Canvey before making any expenditure on development on the Island. [190958]

Keith Hill: The need for an additional access road to Canvey Island is a matter which the local planning and transport authorities should take into account when they are considering any proposals for further major development which may be brought forward; the East of England Development Agency (EEDA) is not empowered or funded to build infrastructure.

Care Homes

Sue Doughty: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the average price paid for each care home bed by the local authority in a non-local authority run home was in Surrey in each year since 1997. [188170]

Dr. Ladyman: I have been asked to reply.

This information is not available centrally.

Gypsies

Mr. Gray: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what estimate he has made of the number of Gypsies of (a) English, (b) Irish and (c) Eastern European origin in England. [190727]

Keith Hill: This information is not available—at present the bi-annual Count of Gypsy and Traveller Caravans does not require local authorities to record the ethnicity of caravan dwellers.

High Hedges

Mr. Flook: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he will publish the guidance to local authorities on how to implement the legislation concerning high hedges contained in the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003. [191617]

Phil Hope: Draft guidance to local authorities on dealing with complaints about high hedges under the provisions in Part 8 of the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003 was issued on 29 March. The consultation closed on 30 June. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is now finalising the guidance and Regulations and expects the system to be fully operational around the end of 2004.

Housing (South Somerset)

Mr. Laws: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what action he is taking to improve the availability of affordable accommodation in South Somerset; and if he will make a statement. [191283]

Keith Hill: Through the Housing Corporation's Approved Development Programme (ADP) the South West Housing Body has allocated the following amounts to deliver 324 Affordable Homes in South Somerset from 2003 until 2006:

2003–04	1,518,626
2004–05	1,300,629
2005–06	4,007,790

Mobile Phone Masts

Mr. John Taylor: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he intends to publish a response to the recommendations of the All Party Mobile Group on Mobile Phone Masts published in July. [190640]

Keith Hill: The Government do not intend to publish a formal response to the recommendations in the report on mobile phone masts published by the All Party Mobile Group in July.

The Government have welcomed the report and acknowledges the work that went into preparing the report and the expert knowledge and advice given by those who presented written and oral evidence to the Group. Accordingly, the Government have given a commitment to reviewing the Group's recommendations in taking forward Government policy on planning for telecommunications. This is happening, as evidenced by the recent publication of the consultation document "Changes to the System of Planning Fees in England" which made direct reference to the Group's work.

Planning Appeals

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the current average delay is at the Planning Inspectorate in dealing with appeals; what action is being taken to reduce the backlog of cases; and if he will make a statement. [190931]

Keith Hill: The Planning Inspectorate has been faced with a very large increase in planning appeals over the last 18 months. 22,548 planning appeals were received in 2003–04, an increase of 21.5 per cent. compared to the previous year. In the six months to 30 September 2004 there was a 23 per cent. rise in receipts of planning appeals compared to the same period in the previous year. As a result of the substantial increase in the number of cases, the Inspectorate is currently taking an average 52 weeks to arrange a site visit, and 60 weeks to arrange a hearing or inquiry. The Planning Inspectorate are taking a number of steps to reduce the backlog of cases including taking on an additional 29 consultant Inspectors, carrying out a pilot scheme to encourage appellants to go for the less resource intensive written representations rather than hearings method, working to identify and implement ways of increasing the productivity of Inspectors, reviewing how householder cases are dealt with and restructuring the Inspectorate to increase the capacity to deal with the casework. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has also provided an additional £1 million to the Inspectorate this year to help them deal with the backlog.

Mr. Truswell: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many planning appeals relating to the Leeds Metropolitan District area have been (a) submitted, (b) upheld and (c) rejected in the last five years for which figures are available. [190503]

Keith Hill: The information requested is tabled below.

Planning Permission

Mr. Drew: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the numbers of campaigning and advertising signs in the countryside, with regard to the planning permission which is required; and what criteria are used to determine whether such signs constitute flyposting. [190892]

Keith Hill: Outdoor advertisements, including signs, and those displayed in campaigns in the countryside are controlled by local planning authorities. They will be lawfully displayed provided they are in accordance with the Town and Country Planning (Control of Advertisements) Regulations 1992. Fly-posting is any printed matter designed for the purpose of advertising, announcement or direction which is affixed without authorisation to any surface.

Playing Fields and Parks

Bob Spink: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many additional (a) playing fields and (b) parks he estimates will be required under the Government's plan for an additional 120,000 houses to be built between 2003 and 2016 in the Thames Gateway. [190940]

Keith Hill: This information is not held centrally. It has always been an important part of the planning system to co-ordinate new development with the infrastructure it demands, including green space. The plan-led system ensures that links between infrastructure and developments are properly investigated. Planning Policy Statement 12 (PPS12) requires that local planning authorities develop a strategic approach to infrastructure provision when preparing local development documents, in terms of transport, water, sewerage, waste and general community facilities.

The Government's commitment to the provision of green space, including parks and playing fields, was laid out in Planning Policy Statement 1, which said that well designed public and green space were required as part of building sustainable communities. The Government stated in Planning Policy Guidance 17 that open space standards are best set at a local level as national standards cannot cater for local circumstances. Local authorities are expected to carry out assessments of the needs of their communities that will be used to set robust standards for the provision of all types of open space. This applies equally in the Thames Gateway as elsewhere in the country.

The Government are encouraging the enhancement and the creation of a range of new green space within the Gateway, not just playing fields and parks. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and Department for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs jointly published Creating Sustainable Communities: Greening the Gateway in January 2004, setting out the importance of green infrastructure in the Thames Gateway.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is funding a number of projects that will provide playing fields and parks within the Gateway. For example, we have awarded £18.5 million to the Craylands and Fryens development, which will include the construction of three new football pitches. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has also awarded £4.5 million for the Kent Thames Gateway Environment Programme, which will allow for the development of a new regional park in north Kent.

Regional Spatial Strategies

Bob Spink: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether the regional spatial strategies for the South East and East of England regions will be expected to identify the required level of provision for community facilities and infrastructure in respect of the Thames Gateway; and how these will reflect increased house-building in the Thames Gateway. [190688]

Keith Hill: The Thames Gateway is covered by three regional planning authorities—the Mayor of London, East of England and South East England. These three authorities have issued collectively an Interregional Planning Statement, published in August 2004. It sets out the allocation of 128,500 new homes in the Thames Gateway sub-region by 2016. Alongside the housing projections, the statement also identifies work to deliver environmental, social, physical and essential services to support the growth agenda and secure overall sustainability. The statement is not a statutory document, but serves as a collective approach for the three Gateway planning authorities until regional plans come to fruition.

Statutory planning guidance for the Gateway will be provided through the regional spatial strategies for London, the South East and East. The London Plan was published in February 2004. It has always been an important part of the planning system to co-ordinate new development with the infrastructure it demands. The plan-led system ensures that links between infrastructure and developments are properly investigated. Planning Policy Statement 12 (PPS12) requires that local planning authorities develop a strategic approach to infrastructure provision when preparing local development documents, in terms of transport, water, sewerage, waste and general community facilities.

Regional planning guidance for the South East and East of England regions is currently under development. It is a planning requirement that RSSs are prepared with the objective of contributing to the achievement of sustainable development. The draft strategies are being developed by the Regional Assemblies who will be expected to take into account community and infrastructure needs in producing their plans, and are duty bound to present several options. It is for example a requirement that regional strategies incorporate transport strategies that set out the transport infrastructure required to support development.

The Government Offices will be heavily involved in the development of the regional strategies and will work to secure commitments to the Thames Gateway programme not only in terms of housing numbers, but also in terms of the infrastructure needed to support growth.

In addition, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is working closely with other Government Departments to ensure that the raft of community services and infrastructure required to support housing growth will be delivered across the Gateway. This work is led by MISC 22, the Cabinet Committee that oversees the development of the growth areas in England.

School Provision

Bob Spink: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many additional (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools will be required under the Government's growth plan for additional houses to be built between 2003 and 2016 in the Thames Gateway. [190740]

Keith Hill: It is the responsibility of each local education authority to plan school provision in its area taking account of changes in local population. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Department for Education and Skills are working together to assist local authorities in planning future needs in respect of school provision, for example, by providing forecasts of population changes in the Thames Gateway.

Where plans are developed for new primary schools, or to enlarge any other existing schools, to meet population growth, these must be subject to local consultation before being published. The final decision on the proposals will generally be taken by the local School Organisation Committee or, if they cannot agree unanimously, an independent adjudicator. Where a local education authority proposes to establish a new secondary school they must publish details of the need for the school, inviting other promoters to submit proposals, and the Secretary of State for Education and Skills will decide which of the proposals submitted should be approved.

Sea Defences

Bob Spink: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what level of additional sea defences will be required as a result of the Government's growth plan for additional houses to be built between 2003 and 2016 in the Thames Gateway; and where these will be sited. [190739]

Keith Hill: Most of the Thames Estuary is already protected to a greater than 1:1000 year level (possibility of 0.1 per cent. of flooding in any one year) until 2030. This includes a generous allowance for future sea level rise until 2030 and is a far higher standard of protection than in most other parts of the UK. Growth in the Thames Gateway will be largely concentrated on previously developed land in existing urban area, reducing the requirement for additional flood defences.

The Environment Agency is currently carrying out a six-year study of flood risk management called 'Thames Estuary 2100'. This will consider the flood defences that will be needed to protect the Thames Estuary for the next century and where they will need to be sited. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is represented on the steering group to ensure that development does not restrict options arising from the study.

Redevelopment in the Thames Gateway provides the opportunity to deliver sustainable flood defences. Riverside walkways and green spaces can be used to accommodate occasional flooding as well as providing an attractive setting for development. Sustainable flood management will be integrated with plans for a green space network across the Thames Gateway as well as at locations of new developments, such as on the Greenwich Peninsula.

Standards Board for England

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how much funding was allocated to the Standards Board for England in each year since its establishment; and what the estimated cost is for 2005–06. [190790]

Travellers

Mr. Gray: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many travellers' sites were available (a) on the latest date for which figures are available and (b) in 1997. [190742]

Keith Hill: As at January 2004, the latest date for which published figures are available, there were 313 local authority sites available to Gypsies and Travellers in England. In January 1997, there were 327 local authority sites available.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what estimate he has made of the total number of travellers' caravans in England (a) on the latest date for which figures are available, (b) in 1997 and (c) in 1974. [190741]

Keith Hill: As at January 2004, the latest date for which published figures are available, there were a total of 14,362 Gypsy and Traveller caravans in England. In January 1997, this figure stood at 12,796. The bi-annual Count commenced in 1979 and therefore data is not available for 1974.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Solicitor-General if the Attorney-General will make it his policy to adopt the legal opinion of Rabinder Singh QC and Professor Christine Chinkin regarding the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty in relation to the Mutual Defence Agreement; and if she will make a statement. [189117]

Mr. Ingram: I have been asked to reply as the Minister responsible for this issue.

I can confirm that the Government are satisfied that the extension of the Mutual Defence Agreement for a further 10 years is compatible with the UK's obligations under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

There is a long-standing convention, followed by successive Governments, that neither the fact that the Law Officers have advised on a particular matter, nor the substance of any advice they may have given, is publicly disclosed. This is consistent with paragraphs 2 and 4*(d)* of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on how many occasions her Department has sponsored time-limited regulations on business since 2001. [190001]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer my hon. Friend to table 3.13, "Income and Tax by County and Region", and table 3.14, "Total Income by Borough and District or Unitary Authority", on the Inland Revenue website at:

www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk/stats/income_distribution/table-313-2001-02.xls

www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk/stats/income_distribution/table-3142001-02.xls

Figures for 2002-03 will be published in November.

Income Tax (Pensioners)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the cost to the Exchequer would be of raising the minimum level at which income tax is payable by pensioners aged over 75 years to £20,000. [191361]

Dawn Primarolo: The estimated full-year cost of raising the personal income tax allowance to £20,000 per year for those aged 75 years and over in 2004-05 is £1.7 billion.

This estimate excludes any behavioural response to the tax change and is based upon the 2001-02 Survey of Personal Incomes and consistent with Budget 2004.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his estimate is of the number of pensioners paying income tax in each year from 1995 to 2004; and if he will make a statement. [192145]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer the hon. Gentleman to table 2.1, "Number of Individual Income Taxpayers" on the Inland Revenue website: www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk/stats/income_tax/table2_1_september04.xls

Employment (Carlisle)

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many new jobs have been created in Carlisle since 1997. [191352]

Mr. Timms: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician, who has been asked to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Eric Martlew, dated 15 October 2004:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about jobs created in Carlisle. (191352)

While statistics of new jobs created are not available explicitly, statistics from surveys enable comparisons to be made of net changes, in numbers of jobs, from year-to-year.

The attached table shows the information requested, relating to jobs in Carlisle, for 1997 and the latest year available, 2002.

Numbers of employees[1] with workplace in Carlisle Parliamentary Constituency: 1997 and 2002

Landlord and Tenant Act

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many tax returns included liabilities under the new Section 42A of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987 in 2003–04. [190682]

Dawn Primarolo: Section 42A of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987 does not impose liabilities to tax. It requires agents to hold the service charge contributions of tenants on trust in an account at a financial institution.

As those service charge contributions are held in a trust, any income arising on the tenants' contributions is taxable in the same way as any other funds held in a trust. There is consequently no requirement for trustees to identify to the Revenue that their trusts were established in consequence of section 42A, and in many cases trust arrangements were already in place when the section 42A requirement came into force.

Tax Credits

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to reduce the number of working tax credit overpayments. [191295]

Dawn Primarolo: The tax credits system is designed to be flexible: claimants' payments can be adjusted in year if their circumstances or income change. The aim is to pay the right amount to claimants over the year.

The Inland Revenue's Code of Practice 26, "What happens if we have paid you too much tax credit?", sets out the Inland Revenue's approach to tax credits overpayments and the several reasons why someone might find at the end of the year that they have been paid too much tax credit.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to allow tax credit claimants to make in-year adjustments to their expected annual employment income for changes in income of less than £500 per year; and if he will make a statement. [191779]

Dawn Primarolo: Entitlement to tax credits is based on the income of the current tax year if that is lower than the previous year income. Claimants can ask to have their award adjusted during the year, to reflect their estimate of current year income, if they wish.

Otherwise, underpaid tax credit will be paid out when the award is finalised at the year end.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what target dates she has set for payment of integrated administration and control system entitlements for the 2003–04 capping year; and what date she has set for completion of payment of the first entitlement to the single farm payment. [191640]

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Palestine

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what progress is being made in reducing poverty in the Palestinian territories. [190654]

Hilary Benn: Little progress is being made in reducing poverty in the Palestinian territory. Palestinian poverty has increased dramatically since September 2000. According to the latest World Bank report, approximately 50 per cent. of Palestinians are living in poverty on less than $2.1 per day. 16 per cent. of the total population currently live in deep or absolute poverty on less than $1.5 per day. While international aid has not prevented the increase in poverty, it has prevented even more Palestinians falling into extreme poverty and desperation.

Poverty reduction is unlikely to be achieved without a major reform of the Israeli imposed closure regime. This would allow the Palestinian economy to grow again and humanitarian aid to be delivered effectively.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what measures his Department is taking to encourage transparency and accountability in (a) European and (b) international funding to the Palestinian Authority. [190655]

Hilary Benn: Substantial progress has been made since 2002 in improving the transparency and accountability of the Palestinian Authority's (PA) financial management systems. This has largely been the result of work by the Palestinian Finance Minister with donor encouragement.

DFID supported a World Bank Country Financial Accountability Assessment that endorsed the major improvements made. It also identified action needed to further improve systems. The World Bank Public Financial Management Reform Trust Fund has encouraged further financial reform. Disbursement of funding is conditional on the PA's achievement of agreed benchmarks, including on financial control management, auditing, and procurement. DFID and the EC have contributed to the Trust Fund. The World Bank and donors are carefully monitoring the use of donor funds. This benchmark approach was also successfully used by the EC in its earlier budget support to the PA. Allegations about the misuse of these funds have been looked at in great detail, but no conclusive evidence has been found that EC funds have been used for anything other than their original purpose.

OLAF, the independent EU anti-fraud office, has also been investigating these matters for over a year. OLAF's provisional assessment of 10 August stated that, to date there is no evidence that funds from the non-targeted EU Direct Budget Assistance to the Palestinian Authority have been used to finance illegal activities, including terrorism. This is a provisional assessment. The investigations are still on-going.

TRANSPORT

Inter-modal Transport

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the role of inland waterways and inland ports in inter-modal transport. [191088]

Mr. Jamieson: Inland waterways and ports are a valuable resource in the promotion of inter-modal transport. As set out in the recent White Paper "The Future of Transport", the Government want to encourage freight traffic to be shifted from road to both rail and water where this is practical, economic and environmentally beneficial.

Rail Works (Environmental Impact)

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consultations Network Rail has carried out with English Nature regarding plans which have significant environmental impact. [190631]

Mr. McNulty: Network Rail advises that it aims to contact relevant statutory bodies such as English Nature and Scottish Natural Heritage, well in advance of operations in order to ensure that any necessary permissions or licences are obtained. If environmental surveys have identified that operations may have significant environmental impact, communication with these statutory bodies and their experts will then take place to identify procedures that may reduce the impact while still ensuring the safety and reliability of the railway.

Small Petrol Engine Emissions

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps are planned to reduce emissions from small petrol engines, including lawnmowers. [192310]

Mr. Jamieson: Emissions from new equipment, including lawnmowers, powered by small petrol engines under 19kW engine power are regulated by the Non-Road Mobile Machinery (Emission of Gaseous and Particulate Pollutants) Regulations 2004 (S.I. 2004 No. 2034). These Regulations transpose EU Directive 2002/88/EC into UK law and take effect for new engines being placed on the market from 11 February 2005. The Regulations also apply a second stage of more stringent standards that will take effect for most engines by 1 February 2009, the actual date dependent on engine size.

A303

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to construct a bypass for the village of Chicklade on the A303(T) in Wiltshire. [191770]

Mr. Jamieson: The bypass of Chicklade forms part of the Chicklade Bottom to Mere scheme on the A303 and is one of a number of strategic highway schemes currently being considered for entry into the Targeted Programme of Improvements.

A36

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what the (a) planned and (b) actual completion dates were of the works at Skew Bridge on the A36(T) west of Salisbury; what the (i) estimated and (ii) out-turn costs were; and if he will make a statement; [191760]

(2) what the causes were of the delay to the completion of the Skew Bridge project on the A36(T) west of Salisbury. [191765]

Mr. Jamieson: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 5 July 2004, Official Report, column 494W. The works at Skew Bridge on the A36 were expected to be complete by 9 March 2004. The works were actually completed on 30 September 2004.

The contract was let for the estimated cost of £2.51 million. The out-turn costs have yet to be determined as the final account has not yet been agreed.

A66

Tony Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans the Department has to build a road across Curwen Park in Workington at the western end of the A66. [191939]

Mr. Jamieson: The Department has no plans for a new road across Curwen Park, in Workington.

Any proposals for improvements to local roads, outside the trunk road network, are the responsibility of Cumbria County Council.

Air Quality (Aircraft Cabins)

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps his Department has taken, since 1997, to ensure that health risks arising from contaminated cabin air in BAE 146 aircraft are fully and independently investigated. [191635]

Charlotte Atkins: The Civil Aviation Authority on the basis of a thorough, independent study has investigated the safety risks associated with contaminated cabin air in BAE 146 aircraft. The Aviation Health Unit, which is funded by the Department, is currently looking into the potential long term health risks associated with contaminated cabin air.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the EU Ideal Cabin Environment project, due to start in 2005, will examine the issue of contaminated aircraft cabin air; and if he will make a statement. [191636]

Charlotte Atkins: The proposed EU Ideal Cabin Environment Project is likely to focus on cabin air pressure and is not expected to include the issue of cabin air quality.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether his Department has investigated the issues raised by the British Airline Pilots Association in relation to the Civil Aviation Authority Cabin Air Quality paper of 2004; and if he will make a statement. [191637]

Charlotte Atkins: Following representations made to the Department by the British Airline Pilots Association, its Aircraft Environment Task Group has been invited to present a paper on cabin air quality to the Aviation Health Working Group at its meeting on 27 October 2004.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he has taken to investigate the differences between Civil Aviation Authority mandatory occurrence reports and British Airline Pilots Association survey results concerning contaminated cabin air quality incidents in UK aircraft. [191638]

Charlotte Atkins: The Civil Aviation Authority compared the British Airline Pilots Association survey results with its mandatory occurrence reports. Much of the survey data related to low level events, often with inconclusive connections to contaminated air. Inclusion of the survey data in the Authority's database would not have advanced or improved the formal intervention action taken to mitigate the threat to safety posed by impairment of pilot performance through exposure to contaminated air. BALPA's data aligns with the CAA's assessment that there is a downward trend in the number of air contamination events now being reported.

Ambulance Service

Lembit Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of publicly-owned ambulances in England are Mercedes Sprinters; and if he will make a statement. [191793]

Mr. Jamieson: Information available from the DVLA record does not distinguish whether a vehicle was publicly owned. At the end of June 2004, there were 10,264 ambulances registered to keepers in England which were not private individuals, of which 1,024 (10.0 per cent.) were Mercedes Sprinters.

Crossrail

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what he expects the total cost of the Crossrail project to be; what percentage will be provided by (a) the Government and (b) private finance; and what form the private finance will take; [191463]

(2) how much funding the Government plans to give to the Crossrail project over the next five years. [191465]

Mr. McNulty: I refer the hon. Member to the written statement on Crossrail that the Secretary of State for Transport made on 20 July 2004, Official Report, column 23WS, and to the written answer given to my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Keith Bradley) on 13 September 2004, Official Report, column 1383W.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria will be set for the compulsory purchase of land for the Crossrail scheme. [191467]

Mr. McNulty: The criteria will be defined in the Crossrail Bill.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much land which is not part of the rail network he expects Crossrail to need to acquire in order to complete the project. [191468]

Mr. McNulty: No figures are readily available and to obtain them would involve disproportionate cost. The land required to construct Crossrail will be included in the Crossrail Bill.

Dartford Crossing

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the (a) total toll revenue, (b) total operating cost and (c) surplus for the Dartford Crossing was in its last year of operation for which figures exist. [190730]

Mr. Jamieson: Subject to verification by the Comptroller and Auditor General, the outturn for the year ended 31 March 2004 in respect of the Dartford Crossing was:

	£ million
(a) Road user charges	69.1
(b) Operating costs	14.6
(c) Surplus	54.5

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will use part of the operating surplus from the Dartford Crossing to create a new access road for Canvey Island; and if he will make a statement. [190731]

Mr. Jamieson: The Secretary of State has no such plans.

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received regarding the use of the surplus from the operation of the Dartford Crossing. [190732]

Mr. Jamieson: The Secretary of State has received numerous representations regarding the use of net income from charging at the Dartford Crossing. All income from charging at the Dartford Crossing is taken into account in the funding for the 10-year plan.

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the operating surplus from the Dartford Crossing for the current year; and what uses will be made of the surplus. [190733]

Mr. Jamieson: Estimated total income from charging at the Dartford Crossing for the current year (2004–05) is £69 million. Operational costs are estimated to be approximately £17 million. All income from charging at the Dartford Crossing is taken into account in the funding for the 10-year plan.

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many vehicles per day on average use the Dartford crossing. [190734]

Mr. Jamieson: The average daily traffic volume is 149,000. This figure is the average for the period between 1 October 2003 and 30 September 2004 for vehicles travelling both northbound through the tunnels and southbound over the bridge.

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what safety rating is given to the Dartford Tunnel crossing; and if he will make a statement; [190735]

(2) what plans he has to improve safety of the Dartford Tunnel crossing. [190736]

Mr. Jamieson: The safety of tunnel users is the Highways Agency's primary consideration and the Dartford tunnels are kept under continual review in accordance with the relevant standards for design and operation. There is no formal system for rating the safety of UK road tunnels.

The agency has commissioned a study to assess what work may be required for the Dartford tunnels to comply with the EU Directive on safety in Road Tunnels, published earlier this year. This study is expected to be finalised by the end of this year.

Driving Tests

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what level of dialogue he envisages between local organisations of driving instructors and test examiners under the auspices of the Driving Standards Authority. [191026]

Mr. Jamieson: Examiners routinely seek to maintain professional and mutually beneficial working relationships with driving instructors. Many local driving instructor organisations hold regular meetings. Whenever possible, Driving Standards Agency examiners and senior managers attend. The discussions focus on local issues of interest to the instructors.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what role he foresees for (a) driving instructors and (b) the Driving Standards Authority in enhancing road safety. [191027]

Mr. Jamieson: The government's Road Safety—"Tomorrow's Roads Safer for Everyone"—was published in 2000. It identifies key roles for the Driving Standards Agency (DSA) and driving instructors in improving road safety.

The contribution of skilled and well-motivated driving instructors is central to delivering higher standards and improved road safety. Their input is significant, not only in terms of initial driver training but also in encouraging novice drivers to further develop their skills (eg by taking the "Pass Plus" course).

DSA's primary aim is to promote road safety through improving driving standards. Initially this centred on driver testing and the regulation of instructors that provide tuition in the driving of motor cars. However, the Strategy envisages a significant increase in DSA's road safety remit, including raising the standards of all driver training both pre- and post-test. The Government want to raise the quality and expertise of all driving instructors to that of the best.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to make the Driving Standards Authority more accountable; and what continuing professional development is available to driving test examiners. [191036]

Mr. Jamieson: The Driving Standards Agency (DSA) is responsible to Parliament via the Secretary of State for Transport. Ministers set the agency demanding targets on performance, efficiency and service delivery and require regular updates on progress. Key priorities are contained in DSA's Business Plan and Annual Report and Accounts. The latter also reports performance against targets.

DSA's examiners undergo a rigorous supervision regime, including regular assessment of their performance by senior officers, and in-service training and development.

The agency also runs an Open Learning Fund. This is available to all staff and is aimed at encouraging lifelong learning.

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport for what reasons the Driving Standards Agency requires certain applicants to pre-nominate the vehicle before a test takes place; why the agency does not take advance bookings for tests without details of the vehicle; and if he will make a statement. [191188]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 15 October 2004]: The Driving Standards Agency (DSA) administers a Trainer Booking Scheme. This enables those organisations providing training in riding a motorcycle or driving a lorry or bus to book practical test appointments up to 10 weeks in advance. Neither the name of the candidate nor the vehicle details are required at that time.

Candidate and vehicle details must be provided shortly before the date of the test to enable DSA to confirm that the candidate has the necessary driving licence entitlement to take the test, that the appropriate test has been booked for the category of vehicle concerned and that the vehicle meets the minimum test requirements for that test.

For lorry and bus tests, the test centre manoeuvring area has to be set out to accommodate vehicles of differing lengths. Having vehicle details in advance of the test saves DSA time in setting up the area and reduces inconvenience to the candidate.

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the current average time taken in processing test applicants by the Driving Standards Agency is; and what action he is taking to reduce this time. [191189]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 15 October 2004]: The current waiting times for practical driving tests administered by the Driving Standards Agency (DSA) are as follows:

Test type	[1]Actual waiting time
Car practical tests	[2]9.2
Motorcycle practical tests	[2]4
Lorry and bus practical tests	[2]4.2

[1] September 2004.

[2] Weeks

I have set DSA a demanding target to reduce waiting times for car practical tests to a national average of six weeks from January 2005.

Lorry Road User Charging

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what negotiations have taken place between his Department and Her Majesty's Customs and Excise about lorry road user charging; and what the outcome was of those discussions. [191489]

Mr. Darling: The 2004 Finance Act laid the formal responsibility for implementing the proposed Lorry Road User Charge on HM Customs and Excise. My Department has worked very closely with HM Customs and Excise and HM Treasury to develop both policy and proposals for procuring and implementing the charge, and will continue to do so.

M27

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the traffic information signs between junctions 8 and 12 of the M27 were due to be in operation; when it is expected that this will occur; and if he will make a statement. [190819]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 14 October 2004]: The new variable message signs on the M27 between junctions 8 and 12 will come into operation in January 2005. Originally scheduled for June 2004, this new date has been set to ensure both old and new roadside equipment is linked to the police control office and working correctly before being launched.

MOT Tests

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy that the new computer system intended to be used for MOT testing is not introduced nationwide until he is satisfied that no delays will be caused by the use of the new technology. [191186]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 15 October 2004]: Overall the new computerised MOT service should have no adverse impact on test times, but it will take time for MOT station users to become accustomed to new processes. Current trials will identify and address factors likely to cause delays. The system will not be rolled out until we are satisfied that contracted service levels, designed to ensure MOT tests are not delayed, will be met.

New Road, Mawdesley

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what powers Lancashire county council has to designate New Road in Mawdesley, Lancashire, as a 20 mph zone. [190774]

Mr. Jamieson: All local traffic authorities were given consent to introduce 20 mph speed limits and 20 mph speed zones when the Road Traffic Regulation Act (Amendment) Act Order 1999 (S.I. 1999/1608) came into force on 16 June 1999.

The decision on identifying the most appropriate speed limit is determined against an assessment framework, taking into account the local environment, the level of vulnerable road users and the road's position in the functional hierarchy.

Railways

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the safety of the railways. [191459]

Mr. McNulty: The Health and Safety Executive (HSE), the railway health and safety regulator, recently published its annual report on the safety record of Britain's railways during 2003–04. Copies are available from the Libraries of the House.

Overall, there has been a continued improvement in railway safety indicators. The year saw the lowest number of significant train incidents on record as well as no train incident passenger fatalities. The total number of signals passed at danger (SPADs) in 2003–04 was the lowest 12-month total since records began in 1985, and there were also reductions in acts of vandalism, broken rails and assaults on staff. The fitment of the Train

Protection Warning System, which reduces the risks from trains passing red signals, was successfully completed at the end of 2003.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will make a statement on the condition of (a) Romford and (b) Gidea Park railway stations; [191456]

(2) what plans he has to improve facilities at (a) Romford and (b) Gidea Park railway station. [191458]

Mr. McNulty: Romford and Gidea Park stations are managed on a day-to-day basis by ONE Great Eastern. Their franchise agreement with the Strategic Rail Authority requires them to maintain minimum standards of facilities at stations in terms of waiting accommodation, the provision of information, cleaning and maintenance. These requirements are currently being met. An audit programme is built into the franchise agreement to ensure that there is no degradation of facilities.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether it is his policy that car parking should be restricted at provincial railway stations in order to discourage long-distance commuting. [191759]

Mr. McNulty: The provision and management of car parking facilities is at the discretion of the train operating companies. Train operators will provide car parking where they consider it appropriate to do so.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what plans he has to twin-track the rail line from London Waterloo to Exeter; and if he will make a statement; [192126]

(2) what plans he has to reduce journey times on the Exeter to London Waterloo line; and if he will make a statement. [192128]

Mr. McNulty: There are no current plans for double-tracking or journey time reductions. The needs of the area will be considered by the South West Regional Planning Assessment which will include input from the relevant local authorities. Service frequencies from some stations on the line are to be enhanced from the December 2004 timetable. For example, Yeovil will receive an hourly service from London.

John Thurso: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he asked the promoters of the Central Railway project for a guarantee that they would not seek financial assistance from the Government at any stage of the project. [192198]

Mr. McNulty: I refer the hon. Member to the statement made on 25 March by my hon. Friend the then Minister for Transport Official Report, column 68WS.

Shipping

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps the Government are taking to implement the recommendation of the Marine Accident Investigation Branch on the role of fatigue and minimum manning in ship groundings and collisions. [190636]

Mr. Jamieson: The Maritime and Coastguard Agency has instigated a survey, to run from November 2004 to March 2005, into safe manning levels across Europe. The survey will examine the manning levels required by different European administrations according to vessel size and types. It will also study accident investigations where levels of manning or fatigue have contributed to the cause. The Maritime and Coastguard Agency will present the findings to the International Maritime Organization and also to the European Commission. The findings will inform efforts to improve manning levels on merchant ships through international legislation.

Guidance on the use of lookouts on the bridge will be detailed in a new Marine Guidance Note (MGN) on safe watch keeping which is soon to go out to consultation.

Speed Limits

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many local authorities have introduced 20mph zones on roads around schools where this is practicable. [191329]

Mr. Jamieson: The installation of 20mph zones is a matter for individual local highway authorities. As such this information is not held centrally.

DEFENCE

Armed Services Pay

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the pay scales of each armed service. [191735]

Mr. Caplin: With the exception of Chief of the Defence Staff and Medical and Dental Officers in the Volunteer Reserve Forces, all armed forces personnel are on tri-Service incremental pay scales. All Medical and Dental Officers in the reserve forces are due to move onto a new tri-Service incremental pay system from 1 April 2005. The pay of all members of the armed forces is revised annually on the basis of independent recommendations that the Government receive from the Senior Salaries Review Body (SSRB) and the Armed Forces Pay Review Body (AFPRB). Copies of the 2004 Reports of the SSRB and AFPRB can be found in the Libraries of both Houses.

Flight ZD576

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether, in reviewing the decision of the Board of Inquiry in relation to the crash of Flight ZD576, the reviewing air marshals consulted any third party before coming to their conclusions. [191633]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 15 October 2004]: Legal advice was provided for the benefit of the reviewing officers. In giving evidence to the House of Lords' Select Committee on 27 September 2001, Sir John Day referred to this advice [House of Lords Session 2000–2001, Select Committee on Chinook ZD576, HL Paper 25(i), page 120 para 282 A].

Medical Discharges

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people have been medically discharged from each of the three Services since 2002; and if he will make a statement. [183345]

Mr. Caplin: The numbers of medical discharges from the armed forces (both trained and untrained UK regular personnel) are given in the following tables (all figures have been rounded to the nearest 10):

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) when he will answer the question, reference 146166, tabled by the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South on 29 December 2003, on accommodation for junior ranks of the Services; [160911]

(2) when he will answer the question from the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South, reference 160911, tabled on 9 March 2004; [173351]

(3) when he expects to reply to (a) question 146166, tabled on 29 December 2003 and (b) the pursuant questions (i) 160911, tabled on 10 March and (ii) 173351 tabled on 11 May; and what the reasons are for the delay in replying. [182346]

Mr. Caplin: I replied to the hon. Member on 22 July 2004, Official Report, column 524W. The delay in responding was due to difficulties in confirming figures.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will answer the question of 5 May 2004, from the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South, on shipborne surface-to-surface missiles, ref 171863. [187046]

Mr. Ingram: I replied to the hon. Member on 8 September 2004, Official Report, column 1302W.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Boxing

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment was made, as part of the Government's recent efforts to promote boxing as a sport among young people, of the cumulative health effects of repeated blows to the head suffered by boxers; and what her Department's policy is on reducing injuries and deaths among boxers. [190752]

Mr. Caborn: Boxing's governing bodies, under the guidance of Sport England, are required continuously to research and implement new safety measures. In amateur boxing, such measures have included the reduction in the duration of rounds of boxing from 3 to 2 minutes, a reduction in the weight categories from 3 kgs to 2 kgs for Junior Competition (Under 15) and an increase in the size of competition gloves from 8oz to 10oz. Amateur Boxing is also the only sport which requires and provides a comprehensive and updated medical history card for every participant which is completed by a doctor every time a competitor participates.

The introduction of these safety factors throughout the UK has seen a marked reduction in the number of bouts stopped by a referee. Evidence of this can be gained from the recent Olympic Games in Athens where out of 276 bouts contested, only one was stopped and this involved Great Britain's Amir Khan.

The Amateur Boxing Association of England (ABAofE) recommended the introduction of the "Kid Gloves" programme (a non-contact form of boxing). The programme offers a disciplined and controlled environment where young people can learn to box in a drug and alcohol free environment.

British Museum

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what funds her Department made available to the British Museum in (a) 1996–97 and (b) 2003–04. [192347]

Estelle Morris: In 1996–97, grant in aid allocated by DCMS to the British Museum was £33,196,000. In 2003–04 the allocation was £37,669,000.

Funds are also available to DCMS-sponsored museums and galleries through specific project funding streams. In 2003–04 the British Museum was allocated three such awards: £400,000 from the DCMS/Wolfson Foundation Museums and Galleries Improvement Fund; £115,000 of strategic commissioning funding to promote partnerships with regional museums; and £50,000 towards the Africa Project (the first part of a three year programme of funding for this project).

Consultants

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will list the contracts awarded by her Department to consultants in each of the last five years, stating in each case (a) the name of the consulting company, (b) the value of the contract and (c) the purpose for which the contract was awarded; and if she will make a statement. [191741]
